To

more than to any other man is due the existence of the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure. His was the idea; his was the plan; and his has been the business ability and energetic management, as organizer and president of The American Law Book Company, which have made possible the successful publication of these volumes, which are therefore respectfully dedicated to him.

known as "goods." [2] In the restricted sense in which it is here treated, a sale may be defined as an agreement whereby one party, called the seller, transfers to the other party, called the buyer, the property in goods for a money consideration called the price which the buyer pays or agrees to pay.[3] A sale of goods is also termed a "bargain and sale" [4] and an "executed contract of sale." [5]

B. Contract to Sell. A contract to sell goods may be defined as a contract whereby the seller agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a price which the buyer pays or agrees to pay.[6] A contract to sell is also termed an "executory contract of sale" and an "agreement to sell." [7]

C. Sale on Condition. A sale or a contract to sell may be on condition; as where something remains to be done by the vendor to put the goods into a deliverable state, or where the goods are to be selected, inspected, weighed, or measured to ascertain the quantity or quality for the purpose of determining the price.[8] Contracts of this kind stand, so far as their operation and effect are concerned, on practically the same bases as ordinary executory contracts,[9] and are so treated in this article.[10]

D. Sale Distinguished From Other Transactions [11] — 1. In General. The essence of a sale is the transfer of the property in the thing from buyer to seller for a price.[12] The elements which distinguish a sale from other transfers are:

Memorandum of articles sold.—After negotiations to induce plaintiff to buy a lot of jewelry, he agreed to buy a part of several kinds listed in the contract, and the other kinds were erased from the contract, as well as the request at the end of the contract: "Please ship assortment of goods in accordance"—the rest of the phrase, "with the above terms," being left in, so that the paper only contained a memorandum of the articles actually bought, the terms of the sale, and certain guaranties. It was held that the instrument did not become a contract of sale, but was only a memorandum of the articles sold. Price v. Rosenberg, 200 Mass. 36, 85 N. E. 887.

"Sale" distinguished.—Although the term "contract of sale" is commonly applied both to a sale and to a contract to sell (Chalmers Sale Goods 3), there is a marked distinction in their nature and the rights acquired thereunder. A contract to sell is a contract pure and simple, whereas a sale is in the nature of a conveyance. By a contract to sell a jus in personam is created; by a sale a jus in rem is transferred (Chalmers Sale Goods 3. See also Strong, etc., Co. v. Dinniny, 175 Pa. St. 586, 34 Atl. 919). The word "sale" imports an actual transfer of title, and although it may be used to signify a mere contract to sell, yet in strictness it denotes only an actual transmission of property. Marts v. Cumberland Mut. F. Ins. Co., 44 N. J. L. 478. If a contract to sell be broken, the buyer has only a personal remedy against the seller. But if there has been a sale, and the seller breaks his engagement to deliver the goods, the buyer has not only a personal remedy against the seller, but also has the usual proprietary remedies against the goods themselves. See infra, IX, B, 1.

Another class of contracts, which do not pass title, notwithstanding the goods have been delivered, until the performance of some condition by the purchaser, generally payment of the price (Benjamin Sales, § 364) is for the purpose of this article distinguished from ordinary executory contracts and treated separately as "conditional sales." See infra, X.

A "sale," in the legal import of the word, implies a transferring of property from the seller to the buyer for a price, and includes, not only the idea of divesting the seller of title, but that of vesting it in the buyer. In this sense the sale can be only to the party who, on the sale and by reason of it, becomes the owner of the thing sold. State v. Wentworth, 35 N. H. 442, 443.

A release of all one's right, title, and interest in personal property for a sum agreed to be paid may be declared on as for a sale. Kerr v. Lucas, 1 Allen (Mass.) 279.

Loan.—The giving of a note bearing inter-

(1) That the transfer is of the property, that is, of the general or absolute property as distinguished from a special property;[13] and (2) that it is for a price.[14]

2. Accord and Satisfaction. A sale differs from an accord and satisfaction in that the thing given in accord and satisfaction is for the purpose of quieting a claim and not for a price.[15]

3. Assignment For Benefit of Creditors. A sale is to be distinguished from an assignment for the benefit of creditors. An assignment for the benefit of creditors contemplates a transfer of property to an assignee in trust to apply the same or the proceeds thereof to the payment of debts, the surplus, if any, to be returned to the debtor.[16] If, however, the transfer is absolute and not subject to a trust,[17] for a fixed price,[18] and for the absolute payment of the debt,[19] the transaction is a sale and not an assignment, although the surplus is to be returned to the debtor.

4. Bailment — a. In General. In a bailment, at most, only a special property passes to the bailee, who receives possession for a particular purpose, upon contract that after the purpose has been fulfilled it shall be redelivered to the bailor or otherwise dealt with according to his directions, while the general property remains in the bailor.[20] The common test of bailment or sale is whether it is the intention of the parties that the thing delivered shall be returned. The transaction is a

Assignment distinguished.—The distinctions between an assignment and a sale are too marked to be misunderstood. Sales are transfers in the ordinary course of business. Assignments commonly grow out of the embarrassments or suspension of business. A sale is usually for a consideration actually paid or agreed to be paid and created or passing simultaneously. An assignment is in most cases for a consideration already executed, as for a precedent or subsisting debt. A voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors implies a trust and contemplates the intervention of the trustee. Stout v. Watson, 19 Oreg. 251, 24 Pac. 230. Intention of parties.— The important factor in determining whether the transaction is a sale or an assignment for the benefit of creditors is the intention of the parties. Hine v. Bowe, 114 N. Y. 350, 21 N. E. 733 [affirming 46 Hun 196].

bailment if the identical thing is to be returned,[21] although in altered form.[22] If the receiver is not bound to return the identical things but is at liberty to return something else, as a rule the property passes, and the transaction is in effect a sale [23] or an exchange.[24] But if the option to return other articles of the same kind applies only in case of a loss for which the bailee is liable the transaction is a bailment.[25] It depends upon the substance of the agreement, and not upon its form,

Dec. 691, a contract by a merchant to deliver hides to a tanner, to be charged at cost and five per cent commission, and interest after six months, and when tanned to be returned to the merchant to be sold by him, and out of the proceeds of sale the first cost and five per cent to be deducted, and the balance to be paid to the manufacturer, was held on grounds of public policy to be such a sale as would subject the hides to levy and sale as the property of the manufacturer. Cases sometimes cited in support of the view that the transaction is a sale, because the identical grain is not to be returned, are usually distinguishable on the ground that the warehouseman had the right to sell and to pay in money or grain. See Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244, 59 Am. Dec. 623 [distinguished in James v. Plank, 48 Ohio St. 255, 26 N. E. 1107]; Rahilly v. Wilson, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,532, 3 Dill. 420; South Australian Ins. Co. v. Randell, 1 L. R. 3 P. C. 101, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 843, 6 Moore P. C. N. S. 341, 16 Eng. Reprint 755, 6 Am. L. Rev. 450.

In some states it is declared by statute that the transaction is a bailment. In Hall v. Pillsbury, 43 Minn. 33, 35, 44 N. W. 673, 19 Am. St. Rep. 209, 7 L. R. A. 529, the court said: "The evils to be cured were those which were supposed to follow the prior rule of law — the rule of the common law. That rule was that where a deposit was made of grain or other like property, with the expectation that it would be commingled in a common mass of similar kind, deposited by different persons, so that its identity would necessarily be lost, and the undertaking of the depositee was not to redeliver the identical property deposited, but to deliver, in lieu thereof, an equal amount of the same kind of property, the title to the property deposited passed to the depositee. The deposit had the effect of a sale. The statute changes this rule, and provides (Gen. St. (1878) c. 124, § 13) that 'such delivery shall in all things be deemed and treated as a bailment, and not as a sale.' Of course, it cannot be understood from this that the depositor's title to the identical grain remains. The legislature must be taken to have had in view the way in which the business of such warehouses is, and of necessity must be, conducted. They are constantly receiving deposits of grain, and issuing receipts for it, and as constantly taking up outstanding receipts, and removing the amounts of grain called for by them, so that perhaps the same identical grain may in common with the depositors and bailor as to them.[30] The transaction is a bailment notwithstanding the depositor retains the right to elect whether to demand a delivery of grain or money.[31] But the transaction is in effect a sale if the delivery is upon such terms that the warehouseman is not to return, but is to pay for, the grain,[32] or that he has from the beginning the right to use or sell the grain and not remain in the warehouse a week, though the amount in store is not diminished. The declaration that the delivery shall be deemed and treated as a bailment must be taken as meaning that the depositor shall be deemed to be the owner of, and to have on bailment in the warehouse, the amount of grain that he deposits, although its identity may have been lost by commingling with other, the like kind of grain, and although not a kernel of the identical grain deposited still remains. As fast as grain is removed, and other grain is put into the common mass, the new grain takes the place of that originally deposited, and is appropriated to the contract of bailment, so as to become the property of the depositor." And see Jackson v. Sevatson, 79 Minn. 275, 82 N. W. 634; State v. Cowdery, 79 Minn. 94, 81 N. W. 750, 48 L. R. A. 92; State v. Barry, 77 Minn. 128, 79 N. E. 742, the court said: "The general doctrine, frequently announced, that in order to constitute a bailment the obligation must be to restore the identical thing which was delivered, and that where the obligation of the receiver is to return another thing of equal value such receiver becomes a debtor to make such return and the transaction is a sale, has no application when the receiver comes into the possession in the capacity of a keeper of a public warehouse, within the purview of the constitution and statutes upon that subject. Article 13 of the constitution, entitled 'Warehouses,' and section 2 of the act of the General Assembly enacted to give effect to the constitutional requirement, in force July 1, 1871 (Hurd's Stat. (1897) par. 135, chap. 114), contemplated that grain deposited in public warehouses by different owners will not be kept separate and that the holders of receipts issued by the proprietors of such warehouses will not receive the same grain they put in storage, and secures to the owners of such receipts the title and right to a like quantity of other grain equal in value. The proprietors of such warehouses do not become debtors to make return of the identical grain deposited, and therefore debtors for the value of the grain, but custodians charged with the obligation to restore in quality and quantity."

Oil in storage tank.— Where oil was taken from plaintiff's tanks into defendant's pipe line under its contract to pipe the product of plaintiff's wells to defendant's storage tanks at certain rates, and receipts were issued to plaintiff for the oil, defendant afterward offering to deliver the oil to plaintiff, or to whomsoever it might sell it, defendant was not liable for the market price of the oil on the theory that it had contracted to buy the same. Sale at market price.— In Redfern v. Stacy, 12 Ohio Cir. Ct. 36, 5 Ohio Cir. Dec. 340, the court held that where plaintiff delivered wheat to defendants, receiving from defendants a grain check reciting that the wheat was received on storage, "to be sold not later than the middle of July," the transaction was a contract to sell, under which plaintiff had the option of demanding a sale up to the middle of July at the market price, and that on failure to exercise that option, it was a sale to defendants at the then market price.

to pay in grain or money.[33] If in lieu of grain the warehouseman is to deliver flour, which is to be made from grain in the common mass, the transaction is a bailment.[34]

d. Bailment With Option to Buy. A bailment with the right on the part of the bailee to buy is to be distinguished from a sale, the transaction not becoming a sale until the option is exercised.[35] Analogous to these transactions are sales "on trial" or "on approval." [36]

e. Pledge. A sale is to be distinguished from a pledge, which is a bailment to secure the payment of a debt or the performance of some other act,[37] the pledgee acquiring only a special property in the thing pledged.[38] When personal property

W. 1087, where defendant was convicted of a violation of a statute providing that no person holding grain in store should deliver it without authority of the owner and return of the receipt, and the receipt received an option either to deliver the grade of wheat called for by the ticket, or to pay the bearer the market price on surrender of the ticket, it was held that this did not render the transaction a sale, but merely gave the warehouseman an option to buy when the receipt was presented, which could only be exercised when it was presented and by payment. is delivered as security the transaction is a pledge.[39] But if goods are delivered by a debtor to his creditor in payment of the debt, the transaction has the effect of a sale;[40] and the same is true if goods are delivered by the debtor to the creditor to be sold, and the proceeds applied on the debt with a return of the surplus.[41] A transaction on its face a sale will not be converted into a pledge by a mere agreement to resell.[42]

5. Chattel Mortgage — a. In General. A sale is to be distinguished from a chattel mortgage, which is the transfer of the title to personal property as security for the payment of money or the performance of some other act, subject to the condition that upon performance by the transferrer the title shall revest in him.[43] In some jurisdictions, however, it is held that the mortgage does not transfer the title, but gives only a lien.[44] In determining whether a transaction is a sale or a mortgage the court will take into consideration the intention of the parties in view of all the circumstances.[45] When on the face of the transaction it is doubtful whether the parties intended a mortgage or a sale,[46] or there is great disparity between the value of the property and the price,[47] or fraud has intervened to make a transaction intended as a mortgage assume the form of an absolute sale,[48] equity will treat the transaction as for security only. But equity will not interfere to declare a contract which on its face is an absolute sale to be a mortgage when it appears that the transaction was intended to defraud the vendor's creditors.[49] A bill of sale absolute on its face may be shown by other writings and acts of the parties to have been intended as a mortgage.[50] In most jurisdictions it is the established rule that parol evidence is admissible to show that a bill of sale absolute

Acts of parties.— Where plaintiff contends that he made an absolute sale of the property, and defendant claims that he accepted the bill of sale as a chattel mortgage, it is competent for plaintiff to show that defendant has sold the property, or a part thereof, as his own. Eby v. Winters, 51 Kan. 777, 33 Pac. 471.

Circumstances attending transaction.— In a suit to have a bill of sale of plaintiff's interest in a firm to defendant declared security for the firm's indebtedness to defendant, evidence showing that the firm was solvent, having assets exceeding the liabilities, so that plaintiff had a substantial interest in the business, is admissible to corroborate plaintiff's statement that the bill of sale was merely intended to secure defendant on account of the firm's indebtedness to him. Donnelly v. McArdle, 86 N. Y. App. Div. 33, 83 N. Y. Suppl. 193. Where one claims goods as a buyer, a note given to him by the alleged seller, on the day of the sale, equal in amount to the sum then paid by him to the alleged seller, is admissible to show that the transaction was a loan, and not a sale. Land v. Klein, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 3, 50 S. W. 638.

Henderson v. Mayhew, 2 Gill (Md.) 393, 41 Am. Dec. 434; Rogers v. Severson, 2 Gill (Md.) 385. The general rule that parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument is confined to the parties to the instrument, and does not prevent an assignee in insolvency from showing that an absolute bill of sale given by his assignor for an inadequate consideration was verbally agreed to be considered as a mortgage. Illustrations.— Proof that the vendee took from the vendor no note or other evidence of the debt, although a strong circumstance to show that a sale, and not a mortgage, was intended, is by no means conclusive. Robinson v. Farrelly, 16 Ala. 472. The surrender by a creditor of certain notes to a debtor, on the execution of a bill of sale by the latter to the former, is not conclusive that the transaction was a sale and not a mortgage. Buhl Iron Works v. Teuton, 67 Mich. 623, 35 N. W. 804. Where a bill of sale was executed in payment of a precedent debt, the use of the word "security" by the vendee upon the witness' stand in describing the transaction is not sufficient to fix the character of such instrument as a mortgage. Prentiss Tool, etc., Co. v. Schirmer, 136 N. Y. 305, 32 N. E. 849, 32 Am. St. Rep. 737 [affirming 17 N. Y. Suppl. 662]. On an issue as to whether a transaction was a sale by plaintiff to defendant of notes and mortgages, as claimed by defendant, or was an assignment as collateral security, as it purported to be, and as was claimed by plaintiff, a statement in a letter from plaintiff to defendant's attorney that the transaction "was only an indirect way to purchase" the notes and mortgages is sufficient corroboration of defendant's testimony to sustain a finding in his favor. Standen v. Brown, 31 N. Y. Suppl. 535 [affirmed in 152 N. Y. 128, 46 N. E. 167]. There must be proof of facts and circumstances dehors the deed, and proof of the declaration of the parties alone will not be sufficient. Colvard v. Waugh, 56 N. C. 335. Where it is alleged that part of the paper on which an absolute bill of sale is written has been torn off, and that the detached part contained a stipulation allowing the vendor to redeem, proof that the paper is mutilated is not sufficient. Executory contract of sale.—An agreement providing that whereas the owners of a ship have sold to another one-third part thereof for one dollar, the condition of the agreement being that such other shall cause to be paid three thousand dollars when the ship shall have been launched clear of liens, is an executory contract providing for a future purchase, and not a mortgage. Notes for purchase-money.—A note given in part payment of the price of chattels, providing that the title shall remain in the vendor until the note is paid, with the right on default to take possession of the property without refunding any money previously paid on account of said purchase, is a contract for an absolute sale and mortgage back to secure the agreed price. Baldwin v. Crow, 86 Ky. 679, 7 S. W. 146, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 836.

Obscure instruments.— On the question whether an obscurely worded instrument was an absolute bill of sale or a mortgage, if it conveyed title and was consummated by a delivery of the property, it should be deemed an absolute bill of sale. Gladden v. Dozier, 71 Ga. 380. Where A, an attorney, in consideration of services to be rendered, took from B an instrument: "Received of J. J. Findley and W. F. Findley twenty-five dollars in full payment for one black cow. . . . It is agreed by the purchasers . . . that said Hughes shall retain the property and use the same from this date to the first day of October next, at which time should the said Hughes pay to said Findleys twenty-five dollars, then the property is to remain the said Hughes', but if the money be not paid that day, the property to be delivered up to the said Findley," it was held that this was a mortgage. Morrow v. Turney, 35 Ala. 131.

An instrument, executed by the purchaser at a time subsequent to that of the purchase, and not in pursuance of the contract of purchase, by which he offers the seller the right to repurchase at what he himself gave, with interest, does not make the original transaction a mortgage. buyer to demand and enforce repayment the transaction is not a sale but in the nature of a mortgage.[65]

6. Contract For Work, Labor, and Material. Whether a contract is one for the sale of goods or is merely a contract for work, labor, and materials is chiefly important in determining whether the contract is one "for the sale of goods" within the statute of frauds, and for determining this question different rules prevail in different jurisdictions.[66] In cases in which the statute of frauds is not involved, the question whether a contract is for the sale of goods, or for work, labor, and materials must be determined in accordance with the rule prevailing in the jurisdiction in cases arising under the statute.[67]

7. Exchange or Barter. If the consideration for the transfer of the property is other goods, no price being fixed in money, the transaction is an exchange or barter.[68] The legal effect of a contract of exchange is, however, generally the same as that of a contract of sale.[69]

8. Gift. If there be no valuable consideration for the transfer of the property, the transaction is a gift.[70]

II. Requisites and Validity of Contract.

A. In General. To constitute a valid sale[71] there must be: (1) Parties competent to contract;[72] (2) a subject-matter or thing sold;[73] (3) a price or consideration;[74] and (4) mutual consent of the parties.[75]

B. Parties — 1. In General. Two parties, seller and buyer, competent to contract, are essential to every sale or contract to sell.[76]

2. Capacity of Parties. Capacity to buy or sell is coextensive with capacity to contract.[77]

3. Parties By and Against Whom Contract May Be Enforced. The obligations and duties arising out of a contract are due only to those with whom it is made; and therefore an action on the contract can as a rule be brought only by one who is a party to the contract,[78] and against one who is a party.[79]

Exchange frequently denominated sale.— Where goods are delivered upon such terms that the receiver is not bound to return the identical goods, but is at liberty to return something else, the property passes, and the courts frequently denominate the transaction a sale. Insufficient consideration.—A conveyed five slaves to his daughter B, upon the consideration of natural love and affection and of one hundred dollars. It was held that, as the consideration of one hundred dollars was insufficient to support a sale of the slaves, this was a gift, and not a sale. Pearl v. Hansborough, 9 Humphr. (Tenn.) 426. See also Gifts, 20 Cyc. 1215.

4. Sale on Credit of Third Person. Where goods are furnished by one person to another on the request and credit of a third person, he, and not the one who receives the goods, is liable as buyer to pay for the same.[80] But it is not enough to charge a third person with payment that he requested the seller to give credit to the person to whom the goods were furnished,[81] or that the seller looked to a third person for payment, in the absence of a promise, express or implied, on his part to pay for them.[82]

6. DETERMINATION OF PARTIES — a. Evidence. Who is the real purchaser in the contract of sale may be shown by the entries on the books of the seller,[84] but such evidence is not conclusive,[85] even against the seller.[86] The person who is the purchaser may be determined by evidence showing who gave the order for the goods,[87] or to whom [88] and for whose benefit [89] the property was delivered. Evidence as to the credit of the alleged purchaser may be shown as tending to prove a sale to him rather than another person.[90]

In General. Generally speaking every species of personal property may be the subject of sale;[92] but the agreement by which a chose in action is transferred is generally termed an assignment.[93] The subject-matter of a sale is commonly said to be "goods," which may be defined as including all chattels personal except choses in action and money.[94]

Statute of frauds.— Most of the decisions involving the meaning of "goods" have arisen under the seventeenth section of the English statute of frauds and the corresponding section of the statute as enacted in this country. The language used in the English statute, and in many of the American statutes, is "goods, wares and merchandise"; but in some statutes the terms include choses in action and some all personal property. See Frauds, Statute of, 20 Cyc. 238.

Choses in action.— In England choses in action, including bills and notes and shares of stock, have been held not to be within the statute. But in this country, even when the language conforms to the English statute, it is generally held that "goods, wares and merchandise" include choses in action and securities which are the subject of common sale and barter, and which have a visible and palpable form, such as shares of stock, negotiable instruments, and the like. See Frauds, Statute of, 20 Cyc. 238.

Things attached to land.— When a contract of sale is made, the subject of which is something attached to or forming part of the land, as crops, natural or industrial, growing trees, fixtures, and the like, the question frequently arises, whether it is a sale of goods, wares, and merchandise within the section of the statute applicable thereto, or a sale of an interest in land within the section of the statute relating to sales of that character; the answer to the question depends upon the particular subject-matter, and there is much conflict of authority upon the different questions thus presented. When the question is presented, whether a contract for the sale of crops, standing timber, and the like is a contract for the sale of goods, and governed by the law of sales, or is a contract for the sale of real property, the rules applicable in cases arising under the statute of frauds will generally be followed, and reference must be had thereto. See Frauds, Statute of, 20 Cyc. 238. And see Prater v. Campbell, 110 Ky. 23, 60 S. W. 918, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1510; Glass v. Blazer, 91 Mo. App. 564.

Money.— Gold, when regarded, not as money, but as a commodity, is within the statute of frauds. Peabody v. Speyers, 56 N. Y. 230. A contract to deliver ten thousand dollars "current funds of the United States," at fifteen cents on the dollar in ten months from date, is in effect a contract to deliver ten thousand dollars legal tender notes for one thousand five hundred dollars in coin, and is valid. Cooke v. Davis, 53 N. Y. 318. Defendant, prior to the passage of the act of congress of Feb. 25, 1862, making treasury notes legal tender, loaned to plaintiff seven hundred dollars in American gold. Plaintiff executed a note therefor payable in "United States gold." It was held that the transaction was a loan and not a sale of gold recognized as valid by the act of March 3, 1863, sections 4 and 5. Warnihold v. Schlicting, 16 Iowa 243. Depreciated bank paper may be the subject of sale. Bos-

2. Existence — a. In General. The goods which form the subject-matter of a contract to sell may be existing goods or future goods, that is, goods thereafter to be manufactured or acquired by the seller;[95] but the goods which form the subject-matter of a sale must be in existence.[96] If there is a contract for the present sale of specific goods, and the goods, without the knowledge of the parties, have ceased to exist at the time of the contract, the contract is void.[97]

b. Potential Existence. According to the rule generally prevailing in this country, a sale of goods having a potential existence[98] operates to pass the property in the goods upon their coming into existence,[99] as a sale of crops grown on the seller's land,[1] the future offspring of his animals,[2] or cheese to be made from the

Non-existence of specific consideration.— Where plaintiff bought from G a mare, supposed by the parties to be with foal, agreeing to give for her the colt, which the mare was expected to have, when it should become four months old, but the mare was not with foal and had no colt, and plaintiff kept possession of the mare nearly three years, the fact that it was impossible for plaintiff to pay for her in the manner agreed upon did not render the sale void, but only rendered plaintiff liable to pay for the mare in another way. c. Goods to Be Acquired — (I) In General. A contract for the sale of goods to be acquired by the seller can operate only as a contract to sell.[5] It was once held that a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered at a future day, when the seller had not the goods but intended to go into the market and buy them, was a mere wager on the market price and was invalid.[6] But this doctrine has been abandoned.[7]

(II) Acquisition Dependent on Contingency. There may be a contract to sell goods the acquisition of which by the seller depends upon a contingency which may or may not happen.[8]

In equity a contract purporting to be for the transfer of the property in goods afterward to be acquired, if they are sufficiently described to be identified, is generally held as operating to transfer the equitable interest in the goods as soon as they are acquired. See CHATTEL MORTGAGES, 6 Cyc. 1052.

Futures.— When under the guise of a contract for the sale of goods for future delivery, the real intention is merely to speculate in the rise and fall of prices, the contract is a wager, and is void. Sale in trust for creditors.— Where a creditor of B induced him to satisfy the indebtedness by a bill of sale of his stock, and other creditors immediately attached it, and to avoid litigation the purchasing creditor reconveyed to B, and, in consideration of a release from his creditors, he made a bill of sale to M, there was an absolute sale to M, agreement to pay, a debt of the seller.[16] But there can be no sale if the parties have not agreed, expressly or by implication, upon the price or upon the manner in which it is to be determined.[17]

Arbitration contingent on disagreement.— Where in March H sold goods to defendant, at an agreed price, and defendant took possession, and the following May it was agreed that H should sell and defendant buy the same goods, the price to be the fair value, to be settled, in case the parties differed by arbitration; and that defendant should pay to H such price within two months after it should have been fixed, and defendant continued possession, in an action by H's assignees, in bankruptcy, it was held that in the absence of evidence that the parties had differed since March as to the amount then fixed, it was not shown that the event upon which the arbitration clause was to apply had ever arisen, and that the fair value mentioned in the agreement must be taken to be the value previously agreed to. In equity inadequacy of consideration is often treated as corroborative evidence of fraud or undue influence which will enable a promisor to resist a suit for specific performance or to have his contract set aside; but mere inadequacy or excessiveness of price, unless it is so great as to shock the conscience and amount to evidence of fraud, is not of itself ground for relief in equity. E. Mutual Assent — 1. In General. It is an elementary principle of law that it is essential to a contract for the sale of a chattel, like every other contract,[24] that there must be a meeting of the minds and an agreement by both of the parties to the sale and purchase; that is to say, upon the one part there must be an intention and offer to sell,[25] and on the other part an acceptance [26] of such offer and an intention to buy.[27]

2. Offer. There must be an offer as such. A proposal which amounts merely to an invitation to make an offer cannot be turned into a binding agreement by acceptance.[28] Advertisements, circulars, and price lists, announcing goods for sale at certain prices, are ordinarily to be construed merely as invitations for offers.[29] But the question is one of intention; and whether a proposal is to be construed as an invitation to deal or as an offer which can be turned into a binding agreement by acceptance depends upon the language used and the circumstances of the particular case.[30] An offer may be withdrawn at any time before it is

Order not subject to countermand.—An order for books, to be paid for in instalments, providing that "'I [the purchaser] understand this order is not subject to countermand or cancellation.' . . . You are at liberty to consult as to my reputation for keeping [business] promises" is revocable before acceptance, and the fact that the publisher incurs a liability to the book agent for his commission, for every order obtained, without regard to the outcome of the sale, does not render the maker of the order liable thereon before acceptance by the publisher, in the absence of any showing that he knew of that fact. amount, acceptance of the offer completes a contract of sale.[59] The acceptance, however, must be one which imposes an obligation upon the accepter.[60] An offer or promise by one person to supply another with such goods as he may order or wish during a certain period may be accepted by giving an order for a definite amount of goods, since the accepter thereby becomes bound to take and pay for the goods ordered;[61] but a mere order does not bind the seller to supply goods for the remainder of the period.[62] Nor does such an offer become a binding agreement by a mere signification by the offeree of his acceptance, since such an acceptance does not bind him in any way.[63] On the other hand, an offer by one to supply another with such goods as he may need in his business during a certain period becomes a binding agreement when the offeree signifies his acceptance of the offer, for, although he may not need the goods, and hence is not absolutely bound to take and pay for any, yet if he does need the goods he is bound to order them from the offerer.[64] The same rule applies if the offer is for the purchase by one of all the goods of a certain kind that another may produce in a certain time.[65]

b. Dealing With Goods. If one sends or delivers goods to another, under circumstances which indicate that a sale is intended, but no price is named, and the other uses or otherwise deals with them as his own, a sale for a reasonable price is implied.[69] If the person sending or delivering the goods names a price, and the other deals with the goods as his own, a sale for the price named is implied.[70] And if upon an order for goods the seller sends different goods,[71] or a less quantity, and the orderer deals with them as his own, a sale for a reasonable price is implied.[72] But no sale can be implied from acts of ownership against one who had no reason to believe that he was using goods belonging to the person who seeks to charge him as buyer.[73]

Plaintiff gave defendant an option to buy a certain judgment. Afterward defendant wrote plaintiff to execute an instrument that would allow defendant to enforce the claim in its name, stating that "of course, this will be on the understanding that, if we use the same, we shall pay you for the claim." Plaintiff sent the assignment, stating that it was to be held in trust until it decided whether it would buy according to previous correspondence. Defendant having used the claim in connection with another owned by it against the same debtor, and realized more than enough to pay the latter claim, must be held to have purchased the judgment. Ct. 906, 35 L. ed. 705 [affirming 32 Fed. 55], holding that where defendants' general agent, after being instructed not to add to defendants' stock, agreed with plaintiffs, who had knowledge of such instructions, to purchase goods from them for defendants, and surreptitiously put them among the stock and sell them, and procure payment from defendants, without their knowledge; and the goods were so furnished and sold, the proceeds going to defendants, plaintiffs could not sue for goods sold and delivered, as there was no sale. And see Grant v. Cole, 8 Ala. 519.

Goods received as from another.— Where shingles intended to be delivered to one were by accident delivered to another, in an action for their value, the party receiving them may show that he received them as from another with whom he had dealings and to whom he had paid their value. Deysher v. Triebel, 64 Pa. St. 383.

7. Quasi-Contract. Sometimes where there is no agreement, express or implied, the law imposes an obligation, often called quasi-contractual, to pay the value of goods appropriated by a person into whose hands they have come.[74]

8. Validity of Assent — a. In General. Apparent assent to a sale or contract to sell may be unreal or invalid, as in the case of contracts in general,[75] because of mistake,[76] misrepresentation,[77] fraud,[78] duress,[79] undue influence,[80] or because of mental incapacity.[81]

b. Mistake — (i) In General. From the principle that contracts can be effected only by mutual assent,[82] it follows that where through some mistake of fact each is assenting to a different contract, there is no real agreement, notwithstanding the apparent mutual assent.[83]

(ii) Mistake as to Parties. Where a person contracts with another believing him to be one with whom he intends to contract, while as a matter of fact it is another person, there is no agreement,[84] as where a buyer sends an order for goods to a person, and the order is filled by a different person, who has succeeded to the business of the former, and the buyer supposes his order to have been filled by the person to whom he sent the order,[85] or where a person obtains

One person cannot, by sending goods to another, gain thereby the right to treat him as a buyer because he fails to notify the sender that he will not buy, unless the relation between the parties or other circumstances impose a duty upon the receiver to speak. Hobbs v. Massasoit Whip Co., 158 Mass. 194, 33 N. E. 495. See also Contracts, 9 Cyc. 258. But some cases hold that one to whom goods have been sent without request is liable as a buyer unless within a reasonable time he returns the goods or notifies the sender that he will not accept them. Retention of goods.— Where a merchant who received goods in excess of those ordered, on remitting the price of the latter, wrote: "Balance of goods shipped me were not ordered. You will please have patience until they are sold, or they are subject to your order, if you prefer it," his retention of them for several years, without proof that he sold them, did not constitute in law any promise to pay for them. Goodwin v. Wells, 49 Ala. 309.

Question for jury.— The question as to what is a reasonable time within which to return goods sent with the invoices to one who did not order them, or to notify the sender that he will not accept them, is one of fact for the jury. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771.

74. See Contracts, 9 Cyc. 243.

Such an obligation may arise when goods are delivered under a contract which is unenforceable (see Frauds, Statute of, 20 Cyc. 245), where by reason of mistake there is no mutual assent (Baldwin v. Mildeberger, 2 Hall (N. Y.) 196; West v. De Wezele, 4 F. & F. 596; Keating v. Graham, 26 Ont. 361), or where a person into whose possession goods have come converts them (Waterman v. Stimpson, 24 Vt. 508. Where seller intends sale to predecessor.— Where a firm with which plaintiff has dealt has dissolved and formed itself into a corporation, the only change in name being the omission of the character "&," and notice of dissolution was published, and plaintiff's salesman thereafter sold a bill of goods, at the store of the concern, to one of the old partners, and the goods were shipped in the partnership name, and received by the corporation, there has been no sale to the corporation. Roof v. Morrisson, 37 Ill. App. 37. And see Buffalo Consumers' Ice Co. v. Webster, 32 N. Y. App. Div. 592, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 56.

Belief of seller as to identity.—Where plaintiff sold goods to defendant's son who bore the same name and had purchased his business and conducted it under the former name, but plaintiff had not before dealt with defendant, and did not rely upon his reputed responsibility, no fraud being shown, defendant was not liable. Preston v. Foellinger, 24 Fed. 680. (III) MISTAKE AS TO THING SOLD — (A) Existence of Thing Sold. Where the parties purport to sell specific goods, and the goods without the knowledge of the parties have ceased to exist at the time when the agreement is made, the agreement is void.[88]

(B) Identity of Thing Sold. Where the seller understands that he is selling one thing and the buyer understands that he is buying another thing, there is no contract of sale.[89]

(C) Unknown Thing Contained in Thing Sold. The sale of a thing which unknown to the seller contains another article concealed in it is not a sale of that article.[90]

(D) Mistake as to Quantity. Where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods, mistakenly estimated to comprise a certain quantity, and the actual quantity is materially more or less than the estimated quantity, there is no mutual assent.[91]

thing to be sold and the terms of the contract, the agreement is complete, notwithstanding they may be totally mistaken in the motive which induced the assent, as where the buyer mistakenly believes that the thing will answer a certain purpose.[92] The mere fact that the thing failed to possess the value, qualities, or collateral attributes which the parties believed it to possess does not render the agreement incomplete.[93]

(iv) Mistake as to Price or Terms. If the offer is stated in such terms that the offeree understands one price, while the offerer means another, the parties are never ad idem, and there is no agreement.[94] So if the misunderstanding arises in the same manner as to other terms of the agreement,[95] or if the offerer makes a mistake in stating the price and the offeree is aware of it,[96] there is no contract. But if the mistake of the one is not known to the other, it can have no effect on the contract.[97] The misunderstanding of a term of trade by one of the parties cannot affect the rights of the other.[98]

(v) Effect of Signing Contract Without Reading. A person may not avoid a contract of sale which he has signed on the ground that he was ignorant of its terms if he signed without reading it,[99] or if, being unable to read, he signed it without having it read.[1] If, however, a trick is used to substitute another instrument for the one he intended to sign, his signature has no legal effect.[2] And, if he is induced to sign by the fraudulent misrepresentation of the other party, he may avoid the contract.[3]

for avoidance of the contract may also, although not necessarily, give rise to an action for deceit.[9]

(B) Representation Must Be of Fact. As a rule the representation must be of fact, as distinguished from opinion,[10] intention,[11] or matter of law.[12]

(C) Failure to Disclose Facts. As a rule the mere failure of a party to a contract to disclose facts does not constitute fraud, but the failure to disclose must be accompanied by an active attempt to deceive.[13]

(D) Knowledge and Intent — (1) KNOWLEDGE. A false representation made without knowledge of its falsity is not as a rule fraudulent,[14] but a misrepresentation is fraudulent if made recklessly without knowledge whether it be true or false.[15] And it is generally held that an unqualified statement of a material fact implies a representation of knowledge, and that if the representation be false it is fraudulent.[16]

(2) INTENT. To render a representation fraudulent it must have been made with the intention that it should be acted on by the injured party.[17] If the representation be made with knowledge of its falsity or recklessly without knowledge of its truth, it is immaterial whether the party making it intended to defraud or not.[18]

(E) Communication of Representation. A false representation made to a third person is not fraudulent unless it be made for the purpose of being communicated to the other party;[19] but if it be made with the intention of being communicated to the other party, and it is actually communicated, the effect is the same as if made to him directly.[20] A person may be bound by the representation of his agent,[21] or of one to whom he refers the other party for information.[22] Acquiescence in a misrepresentation made by another, the falsity of which is known to a party who acquiesces therein, is sufficient to constitute fraud.[23]

(F) Materiality of Representation. The representation must be material, that is, it must have been an inducement to the contract.[24] A representation is material

Seller's agent colluding with joint purchaser.— A purchaser was induced by false representations of a joint purchaser to pay a greater sum for a third interest in patents assigned by defendants than they asked for the entire interest, such joint purchaser receiving a two-thirds interest without expense. Defendants' financial agent drew the assignments in accordance with the directions given by the joint purchaser, and in the presence of one of defendants delivered the assignments, receiving from the purchasers payment for their respective interest. Subsequently the joint purchaser received from such agent the amount which he had paid. The agent knew the consideration, and stated that he was surprised to receive the two-thirds payment from the joint purchaser, but kept quiet. It was held sufficient to show that defendants, through their agent, assisted in the perpetration of the fraud. Felt v. Bell, 205 Ill. 213, 68 N. E. 794 [modifying 102 Ill. App. 218].

if, had it been known to be false, the party would not have entered into the contract.[25] It is sufficient if the representation was a material element in inducing him to enter into the contract, although it was not the sole inducement.[26]

(G) Reliance on Representation — (1) IN GENERAL. (H) Injury Must Result. To give the complaining party the right to avoid the contract, he must have been injured by the other's fraud.[32]

Bridger v. Goldsmith, 143 N. Y. 424, 38 N. E. 458. But where a contract of sale stipulated that the sale was made under the representations therein expressed, and no others, it was held not to be a defense to an action for the price that the purchaser entered into the agreement by reason of false representations by an agent of the seller, not contained in the contract, where he was not misled as to its contents. fraudulently induced to execute a contract upon misrepresentation of the other party as to its character or terms, many courts hold that he is not precluded by his negligence in failing to read it from asserting the invalidity of the contract as against the party who procured its execution by fraud.[34] But in view of the circumstances it has been held in other cases that the person neglecting to read the contract is precluded from asserting the fraud.[35]

(II) Fraud of Seller — (A) Failure to Disclose Facts — (1) In General. In contracts of sale disclosure is not ordinarily incumbent on the seller, the rule being caveat emptor, and the mere failure to disclose material facts does not constitute fraud.[36] As a rule, to charge the seller with fraud, there must be some active attempt to deceive, either by a statement which is false, or at least by a representation which, although true as far as it goes, is accompanied by such a suppression of the facts as to convey a false impression.[37] If the buyer wishes to protect himself further he must require of the seller a warranty of any matter the risk of which he is unwilling to assume.[38] Any device, however, used by the seller to conceal defects or to induce the buyer to omit inquiry or examination is as much a fraud as active concealment.[39]

(2) LATENT DEFECTS. Some cases carry the doctrine of caveat emptor so far as to hold that the seller is under no obligation to communicate the existence of defects in the thing sold not discoverable by examination, such as a hidden disease in an animal.[40] But it is generally held in this country that the intentional non-disclosure of a latent defect by the seller, when he knows that it is unknown to the buyer, is fraudulent.[41] If the defect be unknown to the seller, he cannot of

(4) REPRESENTATIONS AS TO QUALITY. Fraudulent misrepresentations by the seller concerning the quality, character, or soundness of the goods are ground for avoiding the contract,[60] provided the circumstances are such that the buyer was entitled to rely on the representations.[61] If the buyer relies on an examination or test made by himself or another, he does not rely on the representation.[62]

(5) REPRESENTATIONS AS TO QUANTITY. A fraudulent misrepresentation by the seller concerning the quantity of the goods sold may be ground for avoiding the contract.[63]

(6) REPRESENTATIONS AS TO TITLE. Although by a contract of sale, the seller impliedly warrants his right to sell the goods,[64] if he fraudulently represents the goods to be his own when they are not, the buyer may avoid the contract upon that ground.[65] He may also do so if the seller makes a fraudulent representation

(c) Representations Where Means of Knowledge Are at Hand. Many cases lay down the rule broadly that if the means of knowledge are at hand and equally available to both parties, the buyer will not be heard to say that he has been deceived.[67] On the other hand there are cases which hold that a person cannot avoid the effect of his fraudulent misrepresentation on the ground of the credulity or negligence of the injured party, and that the buyer may rely upon a representation of fact, although the means of knowledge are at hand and open to him.[68] All courts agree that if the means of knowledge are not at hand or the buyer has not equal facilities for ascertaining the truth, he may rely on the seller's representations.[69]

(III) FRAUD OF BUYER [72] — (A) Failure to Disclose Facts. In contracts of sale disclosure is not ordinarily incumbent on the buyer, and the mere failure to disclose facts which would enhance the price or other material facts does not constitute fraud.[73] As a rule, to charge the buyer with fraud, there must be active misstatement or such partial statement that the withholding of what is not stated makes that which is stated absolutely false.[74]

(B) Matter of Fact or of Opinion — (1) IN GENERAL. A mere statement by

74. Bench v. Sheldon, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 66, holding that where a seller had lost a flock of sheep, and B heard of them, inquired of the owner if he had found them, and, on being answered that he had not, observed that he "supposed he never would find them," and offered A ten dollars for them, which A accepted, B's conduct was a fraud. See also CONTRACTS, 9 Cyc. 412.

Innocent misrepresentation by agent.— Where the purchaser, in New York, knew of an advance in the price of copper in Europe, but his broker, in Boston, was ignorant of the advance, and, on being asked by the seller just before the sale whether there was any advance, replied, "None that I know of," it was held that there was no such concealment as would invalidate the contract. Coddington v. Goddard, 16 Gray (Mass.) 436.

Confidential relations.— A duty to disclose arises where the buyer stands in a confidential relation to the seller. Smith v. Sweeney, 69 Ala. 524 (holding that the relation between the owner of a horse and one who undertakes to train it for pay is one of trust and confidence, and a purchase by the latter without a full disclosure of all facts known by him affecting the speed and value of the horse will authorize a rescission of the sale by the owner); Oliver v. Oliver, 118 Ga. 362, 45 S. the buyer of opinion, belief, or expectation, although unfounded or false, is not as a rule such a false representation as to constitute fraud.[75]

(2) REPRESENTATIONS AS TO VALUE. Statements by the buyer of the value of the thing sold are generally regarded as expressions of opinion.[76] But it is otherwise if the buyer has means of knowledge not open to the seller.[77]

(c) Representations as to Financial Condition — (1) IN GENERAL. In a sale upon credit a representation by the buyer as to his solvency and financial condition is material, and if it is knowingly false and induces the sale, it constitutes fraud.[78] A representation of a material fact affecting his financial condition is sufficient.[79] A representation of solvency is not fraudulent if the buyer had reasonable grounds for believing it true.[80] The representation must be one of fact and not of opinion,[81] and must not relate merely to something promised to be done.[82]

(2) Reliance on Representation. The representation must have been relied on.[83]

(3) Communication of Representation. A seller cannot avoid a contract of sale on the ground of a representation by the buyer as to his financial condition which was not made to the seller or to a third person for the purpose of being communicated to the seller.[84]

(4) Statements to and Reports by Commercial Agencies — (a) In General. A statement made by the buyer concerning his financial condition to a commercial agency for the purpose of being communicated to its patrons and others applying to it for such information, if communicated to the seller, is a representation on which he may rely.[85] The buyer is not, however, responsible for representations made by the agency based on information not furnished by himself,[86] or for

Knowledge and intent.— A tradesman who knowingly makes false statements to a commercial agency to procure credit is liable to an action for rescission and for damages to one who extends credit on the faith of the statement given out by the commercial agency, and who suffers injury thereby, although the representations were not made to him personally, and although there was no specific intent on the tradesman's part to defraud his creditors by the statements made by him. Mills v. Brill, 105 N. Y. App. Div. 389, 94 N. Y. Suppl. 163.

A statement made to an agency by a partnership of its assets and liabilities, in which a space for "loans from friends or relatives or any other obligations" is left blank, when each of the partners had borrowed on his note from his wife money which had been put into the firm, is not sufficient evidence of fraud to authorize rescission. statements made by the agency to the seller which are not in accordance with the statements made by the buyer.[87]

(b) Duty to Report Changes in Condition. It has been held that one who makes a statement to an agency is not bound to furnish it with a statement of changes in his condition, and that the mere fact that he fails to do so is not fraudulent.[88]

(c) Reliance on Representation. The seller must of course have relied on the agency's representation,[89] and have been justified in so doing,[90] and he is not justified in so doing if an unreasonable time has elapsed.[91]

(d) Intention Not to Pay — (1) In General. Although a representation of Report based on public statement.—Fraudulent representations in the statement required by statute to be filed by a corporation to prevent personal liability to its officers for its debts, and which is made the basis of a report by a commercial agency as to the corporation's financial standing, on the faith of which report goods are sold the corporation on credit, entitles the seller to rescind. Failure to report the truth when he knows that a false rating is being carried on the books of the agency is fraudulent. Taylor v. Mississippi Mills, 47 Ark. 247, 1 S. W. 283; P. Cox Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Adams, 105 Iowa 402, 75 N. W. 316; Lindauer v. Hay, 61 Iowa 662, 17 N. W. 98; Frisbee v. Chickering, 115 Mich. 185, 73 N. W. 112.

Seller put upon inquiry.— Where a merchant made false statements as to his indebtedness in reports sent to commercial agencies, but with a belief that he could pay for all goods purchased, and in reliance on such reports a wholesale house accepted orders for goods to be shipped on credit, and before all the goods had been shipped, the debtor became in default on payments, and the creditor sent its agent to insist on payment, and to arrange for prompt payment before further shipments were made, but the agent made no inquiry as to the debtor's financial condition, and the creditor refused the debtor's request for a reduction of his orders, and shipped the remainder of the goods on receiving further payments, it was held that it was chargeable with notice of the facts which could have been learned by its agent, and that on the subsequent bankruptcy of the debtor it could not rescind the sale and recover goods thereafter shipped, as having been obtained through fraud. In re Epstein, 109 Fed. 874.

Presumption as to reliance.— The fact that a seller, after receiving a report from a commercial agency concerning a buyer's financial responsibility, based on statements of the buyer to the agency, received other information affecting the standing of the buyer, raises no presnmption of law that, in afterward shipping the goods, the seller did not rely on the commercial agency's report. Richardson-Roberts-Byrne Dry Goods Co. v. Goodkind, 22 Mont. 462, 56 Pac. 1079.

Statements not made by buyer.— A sale of goods made on the faith of the entire report of a commercial agency as to the financial standing of the proposed buyer, and not particularly in reliance of a statement made by him to the agency, cannot be rescinded because such statement was false and untrue. Berkson v. Heldman, 58 Nebr. 595, 79 N. W. 162.

intention ordinarily amounts to a mere promise, yet if a person represents that he has a certain intention when he has not, he makes a misrepresentation of fact.[92] Accordingly it is generally held that one who buys goods on credit impliedly represents that he intends to pay for them, and that if he intends not to pay for them he is guilty of fraud.[93] The intention not to pay must be a preëxisting intention, that is, it must exist at the time of the sale,[94] or contract to sell,[95] and must be an intention, not merely not to pay when the price falls due, or according to agreement, but not to pay at all.[96]

(2) Concealment of Insolvency or Inability to Pay. According to the prevailing rule, the fact that the buyer knows that he is insolvent and fails to disclose his insolvency to the seller does not constitute fraud, if he does not buy intending not to pay.[97] Some cases even go so far as to hold that it is not enough

Mistake as to solvency of buyer.— A sale to constitute fraud that the buyer has no reasonable expectation of being able to pay;[98] but in other cases it has been said that if he has no reasonable expectation of being able to pay, this is equivalent to an intention not to pay.[99]

(E) Purchase With Intent to Set Off Debt. On a sale upon credit the mere fact that the buyer intends to set off a debt against the price does not constitute fraud.[1]

(F) Representation as to Securities Given in Payment. Where by the terms of sale a note or other security is to be given in payment of the price, a representation by the buyer concerning the solvency of the maker made with knowledge of its falsity constitutes fraud.[2]

(G) Representation as to Terms Agreed to by Agent. Where the seller's salesman agrees to a cash sale, and the buyer obtains the goods by representing that the salesman agreed to a sale on credit, it has been held that the representation constitutes fraud entitling the seller to rescind.[3]

(H) Delivery of Possession Induced by Fraud. A sale is to be distinguished from a delivery of possession induced by fraud. Where the owner, not intending cannot be set aside on the ground that the parties were under a mistake as to the ability of the buyer to pay, he being in fact insolvent. Lupin v. Marie, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 77, 21 Am. Dec. 256.

Knowledge of seller may be shown by evidence as to statements made to him by a third person. Dowling v. Lawrence, 58 Wis. 282, 16 N. W. 552. Where defendant sold property with full warranty, which he had previously purchased without any warranty, the fact of the exclusion of warranty in the act of sale from his vendor was not per se evidence of knowledge of the existence of a defect, and of the fraudulent concealment of it, on his part, at the date of the sale to plaintiff. Belknap v. Kendig, 15 La. Ann. 203.

Intent of seller.— Where testimony is introduced by a defendant tending to prove false representations by the seller it is competent for him, to repel the presumption of fraud, to show that he informed the purchaser after the sale of an error in his representations, and offered to take back the property, which offer the purchaser rejected. Bush v. Bradford, 15 Ala. 317. Where the seller denied making the representations charged, the court properly refused to permit him to testify that he did not intend to deceive or defraud the purchaser since such statement could not strengthen his evidence. the sale.[11] To prove fraud as a defense generally the same facts must be shown as would be necessary in an action for deceit,[12] and the evidence must be strong and convincing.[13]

c. Fraud of Buyer — (i) ADMISSIBILITY. For the purpose of showing fraud on the part of the buyer evidence as to the circumstances attending the transaction,[14] his eagerness for credit, and that he was purchasing widely is admissible.[15] The fact that the buyer gave mortgages covering the goods and other property [16] and committed other acts of insolvency [17] may be shown as tending the buyer did not rely on them, and that without them the purchase would have been made.

to prove fraud.[18] The financial condition of the buyer at the time of the sale,[19] and his knowledge thereof,[20] may be shown. So too evidence of other contemporaneous acts of fraud is admissible as showing the intent of the buyer.[21]

Wolf v. Lachman, (Tex. Civ. App. 1892) 20 S. W. 867. Where it is contended that the credit was given on the faith of two commercial agency reports and a false statement by the buyer formed part of one of them, it is error to admit one and exclude the other, the omitted report being material in determining whether the false statement induced the credit. Cook v. Harrington, 31 Mo. App. 199. It was not error to admit in evidence old commercial reports for the purpose of showing that a large indebtedness of defendant had always been omitted in his statements, in connection with evidence that in the later reports he had stated that there was no change in the financial condition of his firm. short time after the purchase at a price below cost,[23] or insolvency within a short time after the purchase, no change of circumstances intervening,[24] is sufficient; and insolvency is shown by proof of inability to pay, an overt act of insolvency not being requisite.[25]

10. Questions For Jury — a. In General. Whether there is, in view of all the circumstances, a completed sale is a question for the jury.[26]

b. Fraud of Seller. Whether the representations made were matters of opinion or of fact,[27] or whether they were made fraudulently,[28] or facts were fraudulently concealed,[29] is for the jury; but whether the false statement was material is a question of law for the court.[30] statute of frauds [32] and of any other statute in that behalf [33] a contract to sell or a sale may be made in writing, either with or without seal, or by word of mouth, or partly in writing and partly by word of mouth,[34] as where a written offer is accepted orally,[35] or may be implied from the conduct of the parties.[36]

2. Contract in Writing. The rules applicable to contracts in writing in general are applicable to written contracts of sale.[37] If it is the intention of the parties that the agreement shall not be binding until reduced to writing, there can be no binding agreement until that is done.[38] To make an enforceable contract, no particular form of words is essential, the intention only being looked to.[39]

Certainty.— Where the parties made the following memorandum: "Bought 500,000 of good, merchantable brick from Messrs. Moulding and Harland, to be delivered on Wabash avenue, just south of Van Buren street, at the rate of $6.37 per thousand, to be delivered this fall. Moulding & Harland," and the other parties executed and signed the following: "Sold 50,000 good, merchantable brick to Prussing & Mueller, just south of Van Buren street, at $6.37½ per thousand. Said Prussing & Mueller agree that we shall commence to deliver on Wednesday next, or agreement is of no account. Prussing & Mueller," it was held that the memoranda, when separately considered, showed no sale, because, by the terms, each party contracted with themselves, and, taken together, were void for uncertainty and repugnance. Such a contract may be illegal because of its immoral purpose,[42] or because it violates some positive law.[43]

2. Statutes Regulating Dealings in Articles of Commerce. There are statutes enacted for the protection of the public in business dealings, which generally impose a penalty for non-compliance with their provisions,[44] and which are construed as prohibiting sales on the part of dealers who have failed to comply with them, and the effect of non-compliance with which on the part of the seller is to preclude him from recovering the price.[45] Such is the effect of violation of statutes requiring dealers to have their weights, measures, or scales approved or sealed;[46] requiring coal, lumber, or other articles to be officially weighed, measured, or surveyed;[47] requiring articles to conform to a certain weight or to certain

Agreements to defraud the public.—Agreements for the sale of grain for seed at a price far above its actual value, in which the seller agrees to sell the crop raised therefrom or a part of it for the buyer at an extravagant price, are void in that they cannot be performed without defrauding some one. Duty to make inquiry.— Where one has bought goods from a dealer, under an agreement by the latter to sell as low as he sold the same goods to other purchasers, the fact that such purchaser assented to pay the prices at which the goods were sold to him under such agreement, relying on the dealer's assurance that such prices were as low as he made to others, does not preclude him from resorting to the contract, upon discovering a breach thereof. Holtz v. Schmidt, 59 N. Y. 253. But in the absence of fraud it is no defense that the price of goods is above the market, when the goods were examined and selected by the purchaser's agents and were received by him and kept without objection. Miller v. Tiffany, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 298, 17 L. ed. 540. So one permitting himself to be defrauded by not having the contract which he signs read to him, if he is unable to read himself, debars himself from asking for relief. Concealed defects.— There is no estoppel where defects in the property were concealed by the artifice of the vendor, although the purchaser after examination expressed himself satisfied and retained the property. Ranger v. Hearne, 41 Tex. 258.

Burden of proof.— When plaintiff's knowledge of the fraud and his neglect promptly to rescind the contract are relied on to defeat an action to recover the price for stock alleged to have been fraudulently sold, the burden of proving the fact of such knowledge and the time when it was acquired rests upon defendant. The failure of the purchaser to require a warranty as to the quality of the goods does not estop him to set up fraud on the part of the seller. Bevans v. Farrell, 18 La. Ann. 232. But see Floyd v. Woods, 110 Ga. 850, 36 S. E. 225, where the purchaser undertook to buy the "property entirely upon his own judgment, waiving all defects, either patent or latent," as well as "the implied warranty upon the part of the seller" raised by law, "that he knows of no latent defects undisclosed," and it was held that the purchaser could not set up the seller's fraudulent representations.

Undue influence.— An action for damages for procuring a sale by undue influence will not lie where plaintiff made no offer to rescind, when freed from the undue influence, and knew at the time of the sale the facts constituting the undue influence. J. Conflict of Laws — 1. In General. In accordance with the general rule,[74] the validity of a sale is determined by the law of the place where the sale is made, and a sale which is valid where made will be upheld even in a state where it could not have been lawfully made;[75] while a sale which is invalid where made will not be sustained elsewhere.[76] Courts will not, however, usually enforce a rule resting for its exercise in comity to the detriment of the rights of citizens of the state under its own laws.[77]

4. Sale With Design of Selling in Another State in Violation of Law. The comity that induces a state to enforce a foreign contract does not extend to a contract entered into with the design of evading the law.[84] Accordingly a sale executed with the mutual design of reselling in violation of the laws of another state will not be enforced in that state.[85]

ing at the meaning of the contract.[4] The language of the contract will usually be construed most strongly against the party using it,[5] and if the contract is partly printed and partly written, the written portion will control the printed.[6] While the parties must be held to what they have in fact agreed upon, although the result may be inequitable,[7] if the contract is open to construction, that construction should be adopted which is equitable and will prevent fraud or injustice.[8]

2. Contemporaneous Writings and Agreements. In construing contracts of sale all contemporaneous instruments and agreements in regard to the transaction should be construed together,[9] and if possible so as to give effect to all of them.[10] If a new agreement is entered into for the avowed purpose of continuing in a modified form a former agreement, the latter may properly be looked at in construing the new contract;[11] but writings or printed documents merely attached to or accompanying the contract and not specifically referred to or incorporated therein will not be regarded as part thereof.[12] So too printed conditions on letter and bill heads or order blanks, not specifically referred to or incorporated in the contract, will not be regarded as a part thereof.[13]

3. Circumstances Surrounding Transaction. The circumstances attending the making of a contract are entitled to great weight in arriving at the intention of the parties,[14] and if the contract is ambiguous or uncertain may be resorted to in determining the proper construction;[15] and this rule refers not only to the general conditions under which the contract was made, but also to legal [16] and physical conditions.[17] So too when it is a question which of two agreements constituted the contract the consideration given and accepted may be regarded as controlling.[18]

4. Construction by the Parties. If the language of the contract is indefinite and ambiguous the construction put thereon by the parties themselves will ordinarily govern,[19] if the language used will reasonably permit of such construction,[20] and as tending to show a construction by the parties, their subsequent conduct and declarations may be considered.[21] If, however, the meaning of the contract is clear, its effect will not be controlled by any erroneous construction that the parties may have put upon it.[22]

B. Subject-Matter — 1. In General. While it is essential that the property sold can in some way be identified,[23] a general description is sufficient if the property intended by the parties can be identified,[24] even by the aid of parol evidence.[25] If the contract of sale specifically designates the subject-matter of the transaction, such designation must control and cannot be enlarged by construction,[26] and a specific designation of the subject-matter will control, although such designation is followed by more general words of description.[27] So, while it is not an objection that the contract does not specify the definite location of the property if it can be otherwise identified,[28] if the location of the property is definitely stated, the contract will cover only the goods that are within the location described[29] at the time when the contract is made.[30] If the language of the contract is ambiguous the intention of the parties as to the subject-matter may be ascertained by the ordinary rules of construction,[31] including the construction which the parties themselves have put upon it.[32]

2. Property Included in Description. In determining what property is included in the contract of sale the intent of the parties will of course govern,[33] and this must be gathered from the entire contract,[34] and when necessary, by reference to the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction.[35] Words of description will generally be construed to include all goods or articles that may fairly and reasonably be regarded as falling within such description,[36] unless a

"now on hand in the factory of said company" does not include goods previously taken from the factory and at the time of the sale in a store or warehouse.

Application of rule.—A bill of sale conveying a stock of merchandise contained in a certain store in a particular building does not transfer goods of the seller contained in other parts of the building than the store (Brown v. Loos, 66 Mo. App. 211); and where A agreed to sell B "all the surplus shavings made" at his mill on a certain corner for one year and before the year was out A left the mill described and took another, the sale did not cover shavings made at the new mill (Des Rivieres v. Lumber Dist. Milling Co., 69 Ill. App. 31); but a bill of sale of "all my stock of goods" and all other personal property contained in a certain building or on the lot on which such building is located is sufficient to pass title to a portion of the stock which had been withdrawn temporarily from the building and stored in another building partly located on the same lot (Towslee v. Russell, 76 Iowa 525, 41 N. W. 208).

Particular contracts construed.— Where a bill of sale of logs contains the words, without punctuation, "I do hereby sell . . . all the logs belonging to and owned by me in the Mississippi River and along the shores thereof and also in booms above the Falls of St. Anthony," the words should be construed as limiting the sale to such logs only as were above the Falls of St. Anthony. Van Eman v. Stanchfield, 8 Minn. 518. A contract by which a piano company acknowledges the receipt of a certain piano from the other party to the contract, for which it agrees to allow a stated sum upon the purchase of a "new Pease" piano at regular retail price, requires the piano company to make such allowance only upon the purchase of a new piano of the "Pease" make, in the absence of any showing that there is any piano by the name of the "New Pease." contrary intention is shown by other provisions of the contract;[37] but if words of general description are used in connection with a specific enumeration of articles, the sale will ordinarily include only articles similar to those specifically mentioned.[38] While property clearly excluded by the language of the contract will not pass by the sale,[39] if any property falling within the description was not intended to be included, such intention must be clearly shown.[40] Where broad and general terms of description are used for the evident purpose of embracing all the property of the seller or all of a certain kind, they will pass property the existence of which was not known to the parties at the time of the sale;[41] but the sale of a specific chattel will not carry with it valuables secreted therein unknown to the parties,[42] and the purchaser of a safe acquires no title to its contents.[43]

3. Attachments and Appurtenances. The sale of a specific article will generally include all appurtenances and attachments necessarily accompanying it;[44] but separate and distinct articles not properly attachments or appurtenances of that which is specifically designated will not pass,[45] and if the contract expressly includes appurtenances only such articles will pass as are properly appurtenant to that which is expressly designated.[46]

4. Sale of Going Concern. The sale of a business will usually carry with it such articles, instruments, and privileges as are necessarily incident thereto,[47]

ordinarily be determined as of the time and place of delivery,[60] if there is a market value at such time and place,[61] although accidental causes or manipulations of the market may prevent the market price at the particular date from being the proper standard.[62] The market price should also be determined by the general market price for which the goods would sell in the regular course of business,[63] under the usual and ordinary course of lawful trade and competition,[64] and not such price as the seller might demand or some particular buyer be willing to pay;[65] and it must also be the market price for similar transactions according to whether the sale in question is wholesale or retail,[66] or for cash or on credit.[67] If the goods shipped or delivered are accompanied by a bill or invoice stating a price, and are accepted by the buyer without objection, they will be held to have been accepted at the price stated,[68] and as between merchants an account rendered will, in the absence of fraud or mistake, be deemed to be conclusive as to the price unless objected to within a reasonable time.[69] So also if the goods are ordered from price lists furnished by the seller, the prices stated in such lists will be taken as the prices agreed on.[70]

Although the evidence is conflicting as to the price agreed upon, if there was in fact an agreement as to price, the jury must the goods,[72] or the cost to the seller of manufacturing them,[73] unless a different agreement as to price was subsequently entered into;[74] and in the absence of fraud neither party is entitled to show the actual value or contest the justice of the price agreed on.[75] Although the seller does not strictly comply with his part of the contract in regard to the character of the goods or time of delivery, the contract price will control if the buyer accepts the goods without objection under the contract.[76] On a sale of goods to be manufactured the question as to whether a change in the design will affect the contract price depends upon whether such change amounts to a new undertaking.[77] If the contract contains provisions as to the price but the terms of the contract are not clear, the price must be determined by the ordinary rules of construction;[78] but in such cases or where the evidence as to the price agreed on is conflicting, if the goods when shipped or delivered were accompanied by a bill or invoice, stating the price, and were received without objection, the price so stated will be held to be the price agreed on.[79] Where the contract does not expressly state the price but provides a method by which it shall be determined, this method must be followed,[80] unless the parties subsequently adopt a different method.[81] In such cases the intention of the parties as to the method to be employed must be determined by a construction of the terms of the agreement,[82] and the price as thus established will control and find from the evidence what the agreed price was and not the actual or reasonable value of the goods. Illinois Linen Co. v. Hough, 91 Ill. 63. See also Kvammen v. Meridean Mill Co., 58 Wis. 399, 17 N. W. 22.

Alternative stipulations.—An agreement to pay five hundred dollars for two horses, three hundred dollars down and the balance when the purchaser is satisfied that the horses are sound, should be construed as fixing two prices for the horses, one if sound and the other if unsound, and if it appears that one of the horses was unsound at the time of the sale, the purchaser is neither bound to pay the other two hundred dollars nor offer to return the horses. be binding upon the parties,[83] provided the estimate according to the method agreed upon is a correct one.[84]

c. Market Price. Where the price under the terms of the contract is expressly based upon the market price, the effect of the contract if ambiguous as to its terms must be determined by the ordinary rules of construction.[85] What constitutes the market price will be governed by the general rules above stated,[86] unless the parties agree upon a particular method of determining the market price.[87] So the market price will be taken as the market price at the time and place of delivery,[88] provided there is a market price at such time and place,[89] unless the contract provides that it shall be determined as of some other time or place.[90] If the contract provides that one of the parties may select a date as of which the market price is to be determined, it will be construed as requiring the selection of a date subsequent to that upon which the selection is made,[91] and in the absence of any express limitation that the date shall be selected within a reasonable time.[92] If no selection is made within the time limited the market price at the time and place of delivery will control.[93]

Particular provisions construed.—When the price to be paid is a certain per cent lower than the lowest price made by a certain dealer, "payment to be made promptly on receipt" of the goods, the price of each shipment was to be determined by the prices of the designated dealer existing at the time of its receipt, and was not affected by a subsequent reduction during the season. Wolf Creek Diamond Coal Co. v. Schultz, 71 Pa. St. 180. Contract for highest market price.— Under a contract to pay the "highest market price," it is the duty of the seller to inform himself as to what is the highest market price, and if without doing so he accepts what the buyer without fraud tenders, as the highest market price, there is no mutual mistake which will justify an impeachment of the account or recovery of the difference between the amount paid and the actual highest market price. d. Cost Price. In the case of a sale of goods made at or based upon the cost price, the meaning of the term "cost price" depends upon the situation of the parties and the circumstances under which it is used,[94] but as applied to a retail stock of goods usually refers to the cost at wholesale.[95] The cost price means the amount actually paid for the goods,[96] but in determining the cost price, the cost of freight paid may be added to the original cost.[97] If the goods have not been paid for by the seller, the cost price is the amount which he would have to pay at the time of his sale to the second buyer.[98] Under an agreement to pay such price as the seller may have paid, the price is the amount actually paid,[99] and no deduction will be made for commissions received by the seller acting as a broker for the sale of the goods in question and other like goods.[1]

e. Fluctuations of Market or Price. A contract to furnish certain goods which merely recites what the present price for such goods shall be will not control in regard to orders made by the buyer after being notified by the seller of an advance in price;[2] but in contracts of sale the price to be paid by the buyer is frequently made expressly subject to variation according to fluctuations of the market or the cost of materials, or the price charged by the seller to other buyers,[3] and in such cases the price to be paid by the buyer depends upon the proper construction of the terms of the contract.[4] Variations according to the market where, however, it is said that if the market price at the time and place of delivery were higher than the price upon any date which the seller might under the terms of the contract have selected, the amount recoverable should be limited accordingly.

94. Sylvester v. Ammons, 126 Iowa 140, 101 N. W. 782, holding that the term "cost price" is a relative term, differing according to whether it refers to the cost to the importer, jobber, retailer, or purchaser from the retailer.

Contract to deliver on demand.— Under a contract to deliver to the buyer on demand goods to a certain amount from the stock of the seller "at wholesale price," the price is the wholesale price at the time of such demand. Price marked as cost price.— If goods are sold at the cost price, such price is the actual cost and not that marked upon the goods as the cost price (Sylvester v. Ammons, 126 Iowa 140, 101 N. W. 782), unless the contract provides that the marked price shall be taken as the contract price, in which case the agreement will be binding in the absence of any fraud in marking the goods (Strubhar v. Misch, 68 Ill. App. 241).

98. McCoy v. Hastings, etc., Co., 92 Iowa 585, 61 N. W. 205, holding that on a sale of goods for which the seller has not yet paid, where the price is fixed at a certain per cent of the cost price, the cost price is the price which the owner at the time of the sale would have to pay to the wholesaler, and if the time for obtaining a discount has passed the purchaser is not entitled to have such discount considered in computing the cost price.

99. Salm v. Israel, 74 Iowa 314, 37 N. Particular provisions construed.—Where the contract specifies a certain price to continue until there may be "a general advance in the market price," it will be construed as referring to a general advance above the price named and not an advance above what was the actual market price at the time of the contract. Spang v. Rainey, 79 Fed. 250, 24 C. C. A. 551. Where goods are sold to be delivered at a future date at a certain price, with a provision that the seller shall have the benefit of a rise in the market, with the privilege of closing the sale at the market price within a time limited, if he fails to exercise the option within the time specified it becomes functus officio and the price originally fixed applies. Bump v. Cooper, 19 Oreg. 81, 23 Pac. 806.

Agreement to "protect and guarantee."— An agreement by a manufacturer and seller of lead to "protect and guarantee" a cus-

price of the goods must be governed by what is properly the general market price or what customers are willing to pay in the regular course of business,[5] taking into consideration the different ways in which the commodity is being bought and sold in the market at the particular time; [6] and a buyer who is entitled to the benefit of a fall in the market price is not entitled to the lowest price which the seller may quote to some other particular buyer,[7] or the lowest price at which the buyer might procure the goods from some particular seller.[8] Where the price to the buyer of goods to be manufactured by the seller is to vary according to the market price of the materials, the variation is governed by the general market price of such materials and not their actual cost to the seller; [9] and it is not necessary for the seller to notify the buyer of any rise in the price of materials in order to hold him for the higher price of the goods manufactured.[10] Provisions for a variation of price according to the future prices of the seller also depend upon a construction of the contract; [11] but a contract giving a buyer the benefit of subsequent lower prices to other customers does not apply to deliveries made under contracts previously entered into at a fixed price,[12] nor can a buyer claim a reduction of price on his original purchase where he himself is the only subsequent buyer at a reduced price.[13]

2. EXPENSES.[14] In so far as provided for by the contract of sale the liability of the seller or buyer for expenses incident to the property sold and its transfer is governed by the terms and proper construction of the contract,[15] and in the tomer on lead until the arrival of the seller's agent, with whom more definite agreements were to be made, means that the seller will supply the article to the customer as low as the most favorable market price at the time of delivery. Beymer-Bauman Lead Co. v. Haynes, 81 Me. 27, 16 Atl. 326.

11. Rutledge v. McAfee, 72 Md. 28, 18 Atl. 1103, holding that in construing a provision giving the buyer the benefit of any lower price subsequently made by the seller, the situation of the parties, subject-matter of the contract, and purpose of the provision must be considered, and that where it appears that the object was to protect the purchaser against competition a subsequent sale to the same purchaser at a lower price will not affect the price of the original purchase.

Particular provisions construed.— Where a manufacturer agrees that if any reduction is made the next season in his price on a particular machine, the purchaser shall be credited with such amount on all machines carried over, if the manufacturer discontinues making the particular machine but makes another which is substantially the same, with only slight improvements and intended for the same trade, which is listed at a lower price, the dealer is entitled to the credit provided for in the contract. Champion Mach. Co. v. Gorder, 30 Nebr. 89, 46 N. W. 253. Where a purchaser of rubber goods agrees to take all the "seconds" manufactured by the seller in one year at twenty per cent less than the price of "firsts," the company agreeing to maintain the price of "firsts," the fact that it reduces the price will not justify a refusal of the buyer to take the "seconds," since he has the right to take them at twenty per cent less than the reduced price of "firsts" and in that way meet the cut in the price of the "firsts." Owen v. Matthews, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 813. Goods to be taken "from the deck."— When a cargo of goods consigned to the absence of express provision may be controlled by a usage or custom of the trade;[16] but in the absence of express provision or usage, such expenses incurred prior to the transfer of title are ordinarily to be paid by the seller,[17] and subsequent expenses by the buyer,[18] unless caused by the fault of the seller.[19] If, however, a buyer for his own protection takes out insurance on the goods between the time of sale and delivery, he cannot claim reimbursement therefor from the seller.[20] Where goods are to be shipped, a sale f. o. b. at a certain point contemplates that they shall be delivered by the seller on board the cars or vessel at such point without any expense to the buyer,[21] and that after such delivery subsequent expenses incident to the transportation and delivery shall be paid by the buyer,[22] unless caused by a failure of the seller to comply with his part of the contract;[23] but this rule may be modified by other provisions of the contract seller was purchased before the ship came into harbor with a condition that the goods should be taken from the ship's deck by the buyer the contract "from the deck" meant that the seller should pay all that was necessary in order to enable the purchaser to remove the cargo from the deck, and that harbor dues charged to be paid before goods could be removed were payable by the seller. Playford v. Mercer, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 41.

Storage charges.—Where the buyer of goods to be delivered on a certain date agrees that if the seller will defer delivery to a later date he, the buyer, will be responsible for any expense or damage caused by the delay, such agreement is valid and the seller may recover for storage charges incurred during the delay. of sale whereby one of the parties agrees to assume certain expenses for which the other would ordinarily be liable.[24]

3. Freight Charges. In contracts of sale the effect of any provisions in regard to freight charges depends upon the proper construction of the contract.[25] In contracts for the sale of property to be shipped the term "f. o. b." means "free on board" at the place named in the contract,[26] and if the sale is f. o. b. at the place of shipment the purchaser must pay the freight,[27] provided the seller complies with his part of the contract;[28] but if f. o. b. at the place of destination the freight must be paid by the seller.[29] Where freight at a stipulated rate is made an element of the price, the purchaser to have the burden or benefit of any variation or difference, such provision applies to the freight rate strictly so called and not to the net cost of transportation,[30] and the purchaser is not liable for any increase in the cost of transportation due to demurrage,[31] or entitled to any deduction for despatch money earned under charter parties,[32] and other allowances earned by expediting the loading or unloading of the cargo.[33] If the contract provides for an increase in price in case of an increase in freight rates, the seller is entitled thereto if an increase occurs in the ordinary mode from causes not under his control;[34] but if the contract provides only for an increase of price upon an increase of rates, the purchaser is not entitled to a reduction in case the rates are decreased.[35] Where the written contract of a sale of goods to be shipped is silent as to which party shall pay the freight, it will be presumed that it is to be paid by the purchaser;[36] but this presumption may be rebutted by parol evijected by the buyer because they did not comply as to quality with the requirements of the contract.

24. Burgess Sulphite Fibre Co. v. Broomfield, 180 Mass. 283, 62 N. E. 367, where the sale was of certain property "spot cash, f. o. b. Berlin," but by a subsequent clause in the contract the buyer agreed to "assume all costs of removing the same."

Advances for freight.— Where it is stipulated that the vendee is "to advance the freight" and to deduct the amount thereof out of the price agreed on upon settlement, payment to be made on delivery, the vendee, if required, is bound to advance money to pay freight before the goods are shipped, and if he refuses so to do, the vendor may treat the contract as rescinded. Hartje v. Collins, 46 Pa. St. 268.

Delivery at more distant point.—A provision in a contract that the purchaser might elect to have the property delivered at a more distant place than that first specified in the contract, and that in such case the purchaser should pay "the additional cost of delivery" arising from the change, does not bind the purchaser to pay anything additional for risk or loss incurred through the change, but only for the additional cost. Sheffield Furnace Co. v. Hull Coal, etc., Co., 101 Ala. 446, 14 So. 672, holding that where the price is based upon a specified freight rate to be paid by the seller, with a provision that in case of an advance in rates the buyer is given the option of taking the goods at the advanced rate or canceling the contract, unless the seller shall elect to pay the same, the buyer is not entitled to a reduction in price because of a reduction in rates.

dence of an agreement on the part of the seller to pay it.[37] Where the seller guarantees that the freight will not exceed a certain amount, the purchaser is not obliged to take the goods if the amount is larger than that stipulated,[38] and where the goods are not according to the contract and the purchaser refuses to receive them, he is entitled to reimbursement for any freight paid or advanced by him.[39] Where the place of delivery is changed at the instance of the buyer, he is liable for any additional freight charges due to such change.[40]

4. Customs Duties. Where goods are sold which are to be shipped and are subject to duty, the liability of the seller or purchaser therefor depends upon the terms of the contract,[41] or its proper construction if the provisions as to duties are not clear.[42] If the contract is silent upon this point it will be construed as having been made with reference to the prevailing custom of the trade,[43] but evidence of a custom as to such duties is not admissible to contradict or vary any express provisions of the contract.[44] If the goods are sold to be delivered free of charge, the seller and not the purchaser is liable for the duty,[45] and if paid by the buyer in order to obtain possession, he may deduct the amount so paid from the purchase-money due to the seller.[46] If the duty, although formally paid by the seller, is under the contract to be paid by the purchaser, the latter may recover back an amount advanced or paid to the seller in excess of that actually paid by the latter as duty.[47] Where the contract merely provides as to which party shall pay the duty, it will be construed as an agreement to pay whatever the duty may be at the time of delivery,[48] and a change in the rate of duty between the date of the contract and time of delivery will not affect the contract price,[49] unless it is otherwise provided by the contract,[50] or by statute.[51]

37. Robert Buist Co. v. Lancaster Mercantile Co., 73 S. C. 48, 52 S. D. Conditions and Covenants — 1. In General. In determining whether particular provisions of a contract of sale are to be considered as conditions, the intention of the parties as gathered from the contract as a whole must govern,[52] and in construing such provisions the distinction must be observed between conditions of sale and mere matters of description,[53] or mere representations,[54] and also between conditions and covenants.[55] If the contract does contain a condition it must be so construed as to give effect to the intention of the parties.[56] If the language used is unambiguous it must be held to express such intention;[57] but if not the intention must be determined according to the ordinary rules of construction,[58] and while a condition will ordinarily be construed most strongly against the party who stipulates,[59] yet it will be given a reasonable construction [60] in view of the usages of the trade to which the contract is incident,[61] and will not be extended beyond the plain language of the contract.[62] Conditions may, however, be implied when the circumstances of the transaction seem to require it and the language of the contract will justify it.[63]

2. Nature of Condition — a. In General. The nature of conditions in contracts of sale, whether conditions precedent, concurrent, dependent, or independent, depends upon the intention of the parties,[64] and in construing such provisions technical words should give way to such intention.[65] A stipulation may be a condition precedent in the sense that the contingency must happen prior to the existence of any contract,[66] or be performed before there is a complete contract of sale,[67] or transfer of title;[68] or it may be a condition subsequent, the nonperformance of which will defeat a title which is passed.[69] So also conditions of the contract may be concurrent,[70] or they may be either dependent or independent.[71] A condition may also be of a suspensory character as in the case of a sale of goods to be accepted and paid for if satisfactory,[72] or where the sale is made subject to a subsequent ascertainment of some fact not known to the parties at the time.[73]

b. Conditions Precedent, Subsequent, or Concurrent. Whether a condition is precedent or subsequent depends upon the intention of the parties as shown by the terms and proper construction of the contract.[74] The condition will be construed as a condition precedent if the act stipulated for must be performed before performance can be required from the other party,[75] or if the stipulations are mutual and go to the whole consideration of the contract,[76] or are of the very sarily result from the facts stated, and that if in selling certain goods the seller states that he has previously given an agent in a different place authority to sell them, the sale is conditional upon the agent not having already sold the goods); Reitz's Appeal, 64 Pa. St. 162.

Implied conditions.— Where a written contract signed by both parties provides that the seller for and in consideration of "the following covenants" to be kept by the buyer agrees to sell and deliver to the buyer a certain amount of oil at specified prices, a covenant on the part of the buyer to purchase such oil will be implied. essence of the contract;[77] but ordinarily a condition which does not go to or constitute the entire consideration will not be held to be a condition precedent.[78] Stipulations as to the time of shipment or delivery are ordinarily regarded as of the essence of the contract and therefore conditions precedent;[79] but this depends upon the intention of the parties,[80] and such a stipulation will not be construed as a condition precedent if it appears from a proper construction of the terms used that the parties did not intend it to be such.[81] The condition is a condition subsequent if it was the intention of the parties that upon the happening of such condition the contract should be extinguished,[82] or the property revest in the seller.[83] If the acts stipulated for are to be performed at the same time, the conditions are concurrent,[84] as where the contract stipulates for delivery and payment to be made on delivery.[85]

is frequently one of much difficulty to determine,[88] and while certain general rules of construction have been laid down as applicable to such cases,[89] it has been said that they are of little practical value and they should never be permitted to interfere with carrying into effect what appears to have been the real intention of the parties.[90] Such covenants or conditions are dependent if the obligation to perform the one is made to depend upon the performance of the other,[91] or where in the case of mutual covenants or conditions they go to the whole consideration on both sides;[92] but they are to be regarded as independent if they go only to a part of the consideration,[93] or if the time of performance of the one is to happen or may happen before the time of performance of the other,[94] or the conditions are in the nature of separate undertakings, one of which must be performed regardless of the performance of the other;[95] but a condition may, according to the intention of the parties, be a dependent condition, although it is to be performed in advance of a performance by the other party.[96] If the party to be benefited by a condition precedent accepts a substantial part of that which was to be performed in his favor the condition becomes an independent agreement, for the breach of which he has only a right to damages.[97]

E. Entire and Divisible Contracts — 1. In General. The question as to whether a contract of sale is entire or divisible has arisen in a variety of ways,[98] and it seems that the decisions of the courts as to how such contracts should be construed in particular cases have frequently been made to depend somewhat upon the purpose for which the question was invoked.[99] The well settled rule of construction, however, is that the intention of the parties must govern,[1] and

Agreement for transportation.— Where a contract to sell all logs cut and hauled to a certain stream also provides that the buyer is to pay the seller a specified amount for driving the logs to the point named, the agreement to drive is independent of the contract of sale, and therefore the seller may recover the value of the logs, although they are not driven to the point named. Haynes v. Hayward, 41 Me. 488.

Stipulation for seller's benefit.— In a contract to sell five hundred bales of cotton, to arrive in Liverpool, a stipulation, "The cotton to be taken from the quay," was an independent stipulation for the seller's benefit, and not a condition precedent which the purchaser had a right to insist on being performed. this must be ascertained by the ordinary rules of construction,[2] considering not only the language of the contract,[3] but also, in cases of uncertainty, the subject-matter, situation of the parties, and circumstances surrounding the transaction.[4] The question does not depend solely or necessarily upon the nature of the subject-matter of the sale,[5] its divisibility,[6] or the multiplicity of the articles or items composing it.[7] In arriving at the intention of the parties the nature of the subject-matter is to be considered,[8] and also the nature of the consideration; [9] but the fact that the subject-matter is divisible does not render the contract divisible if it otherwise appears that the parties intended it to be entire.[10] The construction which the parties themselves have put upon the contract must also be considered,[11] and if by their conduct they have put a particular construction upon it as being entire or as being divisible, such construction will ordinarily be adopted and enforced.[12] The contract may be entire, although consisting of separate orders if they are all accepted together; [13] and conversely the contract, although consisting of a single writing, may be divisible as to the separate articles or items included therein.[14] A general agreement between a buyer and seller that all goods are to be paid for within a certain date after delivery does not constitute an entire contract so as to prevent each order separately negotiated between them from being an independent contract.[15]

2. Nature of Subject-Matter — a. In General. If the subject-matter of the sale is regarded by the parties as being in the nature of one entire thing,[16] or the sale is of a specified quantity or amount,[17] the contract is entire, although such goods consist of separate lots, parcels, or packages,[18] and are priced separately or according to certain standards of weight or measurement,[19] and even the fact that different prices per pound are fixed by the contract will not necessarily render the contract divisible.[20]

b. Distinct and Separate Articles. If the articles constituting the subject-matter of the contract are entirely distinct and not in their nature connected with each other the contract is generally construed as divisible,[21] provided of course the consideration is divisible and can be apportioned,[22] the rule applied in such cases being that a contract of sale of different articles is not entire unless the taking of the whole is essential because of the character of the property, or is made so by agreement, or unless it is of such a nature that a failure to obtain the whole would materially affect the objects of the purchase.[23] In accordance with

Rule subject to intention of parties.— In determining whether a contract of sale is entire or divisible the intention of the parties must control, regardless of the severable nature of the subject-matter, and while this is to be considered in determining the intention, it cannot make a contract divisible where it is otherwise shown that the parties intended it to be entire. Morris v. Wibaux, 159 Ill. 627, 43 N. E. 837.

Separable order.— Where a buyer orders certain specified goods and states in the order that "if you please you can send me at the same time" certain other specified goods, the seller might ship and recover for the goods first mentioned without shipping the others, but he cannot ship those last mentioned which were to be shipped "at the same time" without also shipping those first mentioned. this distinction it is generally held that, although the articles are distinct, the contract is entire if the proper use of one is dependent on the other,[24] as in the case of machines to be used together,[25] a set of books deliverable in separate parts or volumes,[26] or a suite of furniture.[27] On the other hand, although the articles are of the same general class, the contract may be regarded as divisible in so far as it covers articles of different kinds, styles, or qualities.[28] If, however, the inducement to the contract was the purchase of the entire lot, the contract is entire.[29]

3. Nature of Consideration. In some cases it has been held that the character of a contract of sale as entire or divisible should be determined chiefly by the character of the consideration,[30] and the rule has been adopted that where the sale is for a gross price, that is, where the consideration is entire, the contract is entire;[31] and conversely, that if the sale is not for a gross price, that is, if the consideration is divisible, the contract is divisible,[32] the rule being that the contract is divisible if the consideration is apportioned among the different articles,[33] and although the consideration is stated at a gross sum, the contract will be construed as divisible if it appears that the consideration is but the aggregate of prices agreed upon for the different articles,[34] as for instance in a sale of a stock of goods where each article was separately valued and priced,[35] unless the different articles are of such character as to be necessary to each other, or it appears that according to the intention of the parties the taking of all or none was of the essence of the contract.[36]

4. Delivery in Instalments. The mere fact that the articles sold are to be delivered in instalments does not of itself render divisible a contract otherwise entire.[37] If, however, the goods are sold in different parcels to be delivered and paid for at different times the contract is divisible,[38] and it has ordinarily been held that even though the goods were sold as an entire quantity, the contract is divisible if they are to be delivered and paid for in separate instalments.[39] The mere fact that payment was not exacted on delivery of an instalment does not affect the rule.[40] If payment is not to be made until all instalments are delivered the contract is entire;[41] but if there is no express provision as to the time of payment it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to indicate a contrary intention, that the different instalments are to be paid for as delivered,[42] particularly where they are made up of articles of a different character.[43]

5. Subsequent Circumstances, Agreement, or Conduct. The character of the contract as entire or divisible may depend on a contingency,[44] or may be changed by the subsequent agreement of the parties as to the time of delivery,[45] or terms of payment,[46] or a severance of the subject-matter,[47] or by their subsequent conduct in regard to the performance of the contract.[48] Thus a contract otherwise entire may be rendered divisible by the delivery and acceptance of a part of the goods;[49] but the acceptance in such a case must be valid,[50] and unconditional.[51] Where goods have been bought at different times and on different terms of credit, the rendering of an account for the whole does not render the contract entire.[52] So too if the goods are to be delivered in instalments and paid for as delivered, the failure to exact payment on each delivery does not render the contract entire.[53]

F. Duration and Termination — 1. Duration. In some cases the duration of contracts of sale must be determined by the ordinary rules of construction.[54] A contract to furnish goods at a specified price which is not limited as to duration will not be construed as a perpetual contract,[55] but will be construed as terminable at the pleasure of either party,[56] upon notice to the other party,[57] or at least within a reasonable time.[58] In contracts of sale, time is usually a material and essential element of the contract,[59] and if a period is fixed during which the contract is to continue, the life of the contract will be strictly limited to the time fixed,[60] subject, however, to any right of renewal provided for in the contract.[61]

2. TERMINATION. As above stated some contracts of sale may be terminated at the option of one of the parties upon notice, and others by expiration of the time limit contained in the contract.[62] Such contracts may also be terminated by the happening of a contingency named in the contract,[63] or in the case of executory contracts by the death of one of the parties, where the contract is personal,[64] although the rule is otherwise if the contract is not personal.[65] A contract for the sale of goods which the seller is to manufacture but which does not bind him to manufacture them may be terminated by his ceasing to manufacture them,[66] or by the destruction of his mill or factory.[67] The termination of the contract

Effect of strike clause.— Under a contract of sale for the delivery of a certain amount of goods in weekly instalments as manufactured, between certain specified dates, the contract containing a strike clause providing that in case of a strike deliveries might be "suspended," if deliveries are suspended by reason of a strike and in consequence the stipulated amount of goods is not delivered by the expiration of the time limited, the contract is not continued beyond this date, and the purchaser cannot require the deficiency to be made up thereafter (Hull Coal, etc., Co. v. Empire Coal, etc., Co., 113 Fed. 256, 51 C. C. A. 213); but under a contract of sale of goods to be manufactured and delivered on a certain date containing a clause "barring fires, strikes, and other unavoidable casualties," this clause does not affect the whole contract but merely the time of delivery, and if on account of a strike the goods cannot be delivered by the date specified, the seller must deliver them within a reasonable time thereafter (Fish v. Hamilton, 112 Fed. 742, 50 C. C. A. 509).

by expiration of time does not affect the remedy for any breaches already existing.[68]

G. Evidence to Aid Construction — 1. In General. In construing contracts of sale the general rule applies that parol or extrinsic evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written contract,[69] and the rule applies to any writing which the parties adopt as the means of perpetuating the terms of their agreement;[70] but such evidence is admissible to supply terms omitted from the contract,[71] to show that the contract was altered after signing,[72] or to show that an instrument on its face a conditional sale was intended as a mortgage.[73] If the contract is uncertain or ambiguous, parol evidence is admissible to explain it so as to give effect to the intention of the parties,[74] and for such purpose parol evidence is admissible to explain the meaning of particular words or phrases,[75] and especially to show that such terms have acquired a special meaning in commercial usage;[78] but if the language used is not ambiguous evidence to explain the meaning thereof is not admissible.[77] So evidence as to a custom or usage applicable to the transaction in question is admissible to explain the contract if ambiguous,[78] but not to contradict or vary its terms where there is no ambiguity.[79] The rule as to the inadmissibility of parol evidence to contradict or vary a written contract does not apply to writings or memoranda relating to the transaction but which do not embody the agreement entered into by the parties,[80] and where the contract is oral and there is a disagreement and conflict of evidence as to what the agreement was, any evidence is admissible which tends to throw any light upon this question.[81]

2. Prior Negotiations or Course of Dealing. In order to explain ambiguities or supply omissions in a contract of sale, evidence of the prior negotiations between the parties out of which the contract grew is admissible,[82] and evidence as to the previous course of dealing between the parties is admissible for the purpose of showing their intention in regard to the particular contract;[83] but evidence is not admissible of previous dealings consisting of distinct transactions and not constituting a connected course of dealing between the parties,[84] or of previous dealings or the manner of doing business between one of the parties to the contract and third parties;[85] nor, if the contract is clear and unambiguous as to its terms and conditions, is evidence admissible of a previous course of dealing upon different terms even between the same parties.[86]

3. Subject-Matter. In accordance with the general rules above stated,[87] if the terms of the contract are uncertain or ambiguous parol evidence is admissible to identify the subject-matter of the sale,[88] or to show its kind or quality,[89] or the amount or the number and identity of the different articles intended to be included;[90] but such evidence is not admissible where there is no ambiguity in the contract as to the description of the property,[91] or the articles included.[92] If the contract is oral and there is a controversy and conflict of evidence as to the property included, any evidence is admissible which tends to throw any light upon this question.[93]

4. Price and Terms of Payment. While the consideration stated in a bill of sale is open to explanation by parol evidence,[94] in ordinary contracts of sale if the price is expressly agreed upon and stated, that price must control regardless of the actual value of the property,[95] and in such cases evidence is not admissible to show the value of the property,[96] or its cost to the seller,[97] although where an aggregate sum is named as the consideration for the sale of several articles, the actual consideration of each may be shown by parol.[98] If, however, the contract is silent as to the price or, in the case of an oral contract, the evidence is conflicting as to the price agreed on, it is competent to show the value of the property,[99] since, in the absence of agreement, the value of the property will be taken as the price to be paid,[1] and in the case of a conflict of evidence it is a corroborative fact proper to be considered by the jury in determining what the price agreed on actually was.[2] In such cases any evidence otherwise competent is admissible if it tends to show the value of the property at the time of the sale,[3] and evidence is admissible of circumstances existing at the time calculated to affect the market value.[4] Where the contract is silent as to price, a price list sent by the seller to the buyer prior to the sale is admissible as tending to show the terms of the contract.[5] If under the contract the price is to be fixed by third persons, an invoice prepared by such persons acting in accordance with the provisions of the agreement is admissible.[6] If the contract is clear and unambiguous as to the mode and terms of payment, no evidence of a custom or usage is admissible to vary it;[7] but where in the case of an oral contract the evidence is conflicting as to whether the sale was for cash or on credit, evidence as to the financial condition of the buyer at the time of the sale is admissible.[8]

H. Province of Court and Jury. The construction of a written contract of sale is ordinarily a question of law for the court,[9] it being a question for the court wherever the language of the contract is clear and unambiguous;[10] but if, although the contract is in writing, it is uncertain or ambiguous and its proper interpretation depends upon extrinsic facts, it should be submitted to the jury,[11] unless the evidence introduced to explain the ambiguity is clear and without conflict,[12] or the language of the contract is meaningless and unintelligible, presenting a case of incurable uncertainty.[13] So also in the case of oral contracts of sale, the determination as to the real intention of the parties is for the jury, if the evidence as to the terms of the contract is conflicting,[14] or the language used ference in price between the first and second class stock.

Mercantile usage.— If the language of the contract when read according to the ordinary meaning of the words used is ambiguous, it is a question for the jury whether the language has not acquired a definite meaning by mercantile usage (Ashforth v. Redford, L. R. 9 C. P. 20, 43 L. J. C. P. 57); but if the jury has determined the meaning in commercial usage of a particular term used in the contract, it is then for the court to construe the contract (Hutchinson v. Bowker, 9 L. J. Exch. 924, 5 M. & W. 535).

12. Licking Rolling Mill Co. v. Snyder, 89 S. W. 249, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 357, holding that, although there is an ambiguity in the contract, if the evidence introduced to explain it is without conflict, its construction is for the court.

is uncertain and ambiguous,[15] or the contract is silent upon some point as to which the intention of the parties must be determined from extraneous circumstances to be proved.[16] So where the contract is ambiguous or the evidence as to its terms is conflicting, it is a question for the jury to determine the intention of the parties, as in regard to the subject-matter of the sale,[17] the quantity or standard of measurement,[18] price,[19] terms of payment and credit,[20] whether the sale was intended to be by sample or upon the buyer's own judgment,[21] when title was to pass,[22] the place of delivery,[23] the time when the property was to be called for by the purchaser,[24] or delivered by the seller,[25] and the condition in which it was to be delivered.[26]

IV. MODIFICATION OR RESCISSION OF CONTRACT.

A. Modification[27] — 1. In General. A contract of sale, like other contracts,[28] may be modified by agreement of the parties as to any of its terms or conditions,[29] such as the time,[30] mode,[31] or place of delivery,[32] the price[33] and terms of payment,[34] the subject-matter,[35] or the parties.[36]

2. Consideration. Generally a contract of sale that is wholly executory may be modified without a new consideration, the consideration of the original contract being deemed sufficient.[37] If, however, the contract is complete or executed by one party any modification thereof must be supported by a new consideration.[38]

be binding unless in writing.[46] The new agreement must purport to modify the original contract or must be inconsistent therewith or there is no modification.[47]

5. Operation and Effect. If the new agreement covers substantially the entire subject-matter of the original contract, the original will be regarded as merged in the subsequent contract.[48] Similarly when there is a modification of particular terms the modified agreement takes the place of, and is as binding on the parties as, the original contract,[49] and neither party, as a rule, can rely on the original contract.[50] So where there has been an assent to a change of purchasers the original purchaser is released,[51] and the one substituted becomes liable as an original purchaser.[52] But a modification of the contract allowing delivery to be made at a different time or at a different place,[53] or limiting the time of payment,[54] must be acted on to prevent the other party from relying on the original contract. And if the modification is conditional it cannot be taken advantage of unless the condition is complied with.[55] A modification of one of the terms or conditions of the contract will not of course affect the liability of the parties under other terms and conditions,[56] unless such conditions are directly related to the modified conditions.[57]

Illustrations of options.— Where, in a bill of sale of stoves, the vendor promised that, if the stoves were not resold within one year, he would take back two of them, and pay the vendee fifty dollars and interest, it was in effect giving the vendee the right to rescind the sale at the end of the year as to two of the stoves. Sawyer v. McIntyre, 18 Vt. 27. A stipulation that, should the purchaser fail to make payments of the price as agreed, he should forfeit the goods which should revert to the seller, and all claims against the purchaser should thereupon cease, is not a penalty, but an option in the purchaser, to either pay the price and take the goods or refuse to pay and forfeit the goods, and a refusal to pay was not a breach. Gallup v. Sterling, 22 Misc. (N. Y.) 672, 49 N. Y. Suppl. 942. But a memorandum, "Guaranteed against our own decline," given by the seller at the time of making a sale, does not reserve to the purchaser the right to rescind the contract at will, but is a mere assurance that the seller would not decline to fill the order and imposed no other duty than was implied by law. Buist v. Eufaula Drug Co., 96 Ala. 292, 11 So. 301.

Assignment of contract.— Where a contract provided that, if the purchaser of property should become dissatisfied, she should be entitled to a return of the purchase-price on surrender of the property sold, the fact that pending the suit to enforce such agreement she assigned the contract was held immaterial, since the statute authorized the continuance of a suit in the name of the original party, or substitution of the transferee where and sale on approval.[65] Such provisions, although not usual, are valid.[66] Under a reservation of the right to rescind the rights of the parties are mutual,[67] and the consent of the other party is not a condition precedent to the exercise of the right.[68]

(II) EXERCISE OF OPTION. The option can be exercised only for the reasons,[69] and in the manner specified in the contract.[70] On the exercise of the option by the buyer it is usually necessary that he should return the property,[71] or give the seller notice of his election.[72] As a general rule a mere offer to return the goods is insufficient under a provision requiring their return.[73] The tender of the goods in return must be unconditional,[74] and must be made at the place designated in the option.[75]

coextensive with the power to contract,[76] and the mutual release of the rights of the parties under the contract of sale is regarded as a sufficient consideration for the agreement.[77] There must be a mutual assent to the agreement,[78] and an unconditional acceptance of the proposal operates as a rescission.[79] If the contract of sale is fully executed redelivery of the goods is necessary to complete the agreement to rescind;[80] but this requirement is fulfilled by a constructive delivery as where the vendee holds the goods as bailee for the seller,[81] especially if the sale is not fully executed by payment of the price.[82] If, however, there is an actual delivery it must be unconditional.[83] The agreement to rescind may be by parol,[84] and it is not essential that a party in express terms consents to the rescission, but such consent may be implied from his acts or conduct.[85] But a return of a portion of the goods operates as a rescission pro tanto only.[86]

3. For Fraud, Mistake, or Default in Performance — a. Fraud. The contract of sale may be rescinded for fraud [87] of either the buyer,[88] or the seller.[89]

b. Mistake. Although the parties may generally rescind on the ground of mistake,[90] it is not every mistake that will afford a ground for rescission.[91] Thus a mere mistake or misunderstanding as to the interpretation of the contract,[92] or a mistake by including in the goods delivered some that were not purchased,[93] will not justify rescission. And it may be said that generally the other party must not have acted on the agreement to such an extent that a rescission would be to his prejudice.[94]

c. Breach of Contract or Condition — (i) BY THE BUYER — (A) In General. The seller may rescind the contract of sale on the breach of the contract or a condition thereof by the buyer,[95] as by the refusal of the buyer to receive the goods,[96]

Injury to buyer.— Where a seller of stocks and bonds of a corporation falsely and fraudulently represents that the mortgage securing the bonds is a first mortgage, the fact that he pays off and procures a cancellation of prior encumbrances does not affect the buyer's right to rescind. Nor is that right affected by the fact that the contract bound the seller to pay off all liabilities of the corporation. Stevenson v. Marble, 84 Fed. 23.

Ordering goods in breach of implied covenant.— Where defendant contracted to supply plaintiffs with all new barrels needed during a certain year, at specified prices, such contract contained an implied covenant that plaintiffs were to order only such barrels as were necessary for their business, which was dependent on defendant's covenant to supply; and the breach of plaintiff's covenant, by ordering barrels with a view to stocking up for another year, and for sale to other parties, constituted a breach of their contract, which entitled defendant to refuse further delivery and rescind the contract. Performance rendered impossible by act of God.—A sale of goods upon credit to a particular member of a firm for the partnership, but upon the express understanding that he shall personally attend to their sale, may be rescinded upon the death of such member, unless the contract has not been so far executed that the parties cannot be put in statu quo, which is not the case where the event above mentioned which rendered performance by the buyer impossible happened before the goods reached their destination or came to the buyer's possession. App. Div. 341, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 1034, 93 N. Y. Suppl. 1146], a written contract provided for the sale and delivery at a place named, for ten years, during ten months of each year, of a certain quantity of pulp wood to a paper company, which company on request was to make advances to the vendor during the progress of the work, not exceeding the cost thereof, and it was held that the repeated failures or refusal of the paper company to make these advances, which were necessary to enable the vendor to carry on the work, entitled him to rescind the contract, so that the paper company would not be entitled to a specific performance thereof; that it was not necessary that the defaulting party actually abandon the contract, or show an intention so to do, in order to enable the other party to rescind since he might want to retain the contract and its benefits, but be unable to perform as agreed, or might wish to annoy or coerce, or deprive the other party of his contract rights; but that when he, knowing all the facts, deliberately and intentionally violated the contract upon his part in a material respect, an inquiry as to his intentions was not necessary in order to define the rights of the other party.

Demand for allowance.—A refusal by a purchaser of goods to accept any further amount unless an allowance shall be made to him for defects in those already received is such a refusal to carry out the contract as will entitle the vendor to rescind the contract, where the goods already delivered are in exact accordance with the terms of the contract. McCowan v. McKay, 13 Manitoba 590.

Dispute as to character of goods.—Where the purchaser refuses to receive the goods because he believes them to be different from those to which he was entitled, he cannot be regarded as having abandoned the contract. Treat v. Richardson, 47 Conn. 582.

Dispute as to weight.—The failure of the purchaser of tomatoes to allow true weight for the tomatoes already delivered was not a repudiation of the contract so as to entitle the seller to rescind. Hartnett v. Baker, 4 Pennew. (Del.) 431, 56 Atl. 672.

Suspension of order.—When goods are purchased to be shipped as ordered a suspension of orders for a short time is not such a repudiation of the contract as will entitle the seller to rescind when the period to be covered by the contract has not expired by several months. Wells v. Hartford Manilla Co., 76 Conn. 27, 55 Atl. 599.

Failure to account.—Where one having a half interest in an unpatented device conveyed the same to defendants on the agreement that they should manufacture and sell the device, accounting to him for half the profits, defendants' mere failure to account for the seller's half interest did not entitle him to a rescission. Hunt v. American Radiator Co., 2 N. Y. App. Div. 34, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 576.

Wrongful act.—A wrongful act amounting to a trespass by the buyer in connection with property other than that sold is not ground for rescission. Lewis v. Clifton, 14 C. B. 245, 2 C. L. R. 1350, 18 Jur. 291, 23 L. J. C. P. 68, 2 Wkly. Rep. 230, 78 E. C. L. 245.

Custom of trade as to time of payment.—Where a contract for the sale of fruit, containing no stipulation as to the dates of payment, was subject to a custom requiring payments to be made on the fifteenth and thirtieth of each month, unless those dates came on Saturday, in which case the payments were to be made the following Monday, a demand by the buyer that the amount due for fruit delivered should be deposited in a bank payable on completion of the contract,

(B) Non-Payment of Price. When payment of the price is to be made in advance of or concurrent with delivery it is of the essence of the contract, and a failure to pay is such a breach of the contract as will justify a rescission,[2] and this is true, although the amount withheld is small.[3] But the seller himself must not be in default.[4] Similarly where delivery is made in instalments a failure to pay for an instalment delivered within the time specified in the contract is ground for rescission.[5] But the conduct of the purchaser must in such case be and that future deliveries would be paid for on delivery, entitled the seller to rescind the contract. Minaker v. California Canneries Co., 138 Cal. 239, 71 Pac. 110.

Separate contracts.— Insisting on different terms as a condition precedent to the performance of one contract is no ground for the rescission of another and different contract. Steinlein v. S. Blaisdell, Jr., Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 44 S. W. 200.

Non-payment in connection with other circumstances.— If non-payment of one instalment of goods be accompanied by such circumstances as to give the seller reasonable grounds for thinking that the buyer will refuse or be unable to pay for the rest, he may take advantage of this one omission to repudiate the contract (Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6; Bloomer v. Bernstein, L. such as to show an intent to abandon the contract,[6] and especially is this true, when the contract of sale is entire.[7] According to some decisions if the contract is severable, a mere refusal to pay for one instalment will not justify a rescission of the entire contract.[8] It is obvious that if the sale is executed, the goods being delivered, a mere failure to pay the price is not ground for rescission.[9]

(c) Insolvency of Buyer. The insolvency of the buyer at the time of sale is ground for rescission if accompanied by a fraudulent intent not to pay,[10] or if the buyer had no reasonable expectation of being able to pay, although he may have intended to do so.[11] Mere insolvency is, however, insufficient to warrant a rescission,[12] especially in the absence of intent to defraud.[13] There must of

Negligence of seller.—A sale of a piano will not be rescinded, because of the insolvency of the purchaser, where at the time of the purchase he tendered to the vendor certain warehouse acceptances as security, but the seller, from the manner and surroundings of the purchaser, was of the opinion that the purchaser was abundantly able to pay and did not take the security. course be actual insolvency.[14] If the contract of sale is executed the subsequent insolvency of the buyer is not ground for rescission.[15]

(II) BY THE SELLER — (A) In General. The buyer may rescind the contract of sale when there has been a breach of the contract or of a condition thereof by the seller,[16] provided the breach is in some substantial particular which goes to the essence of the contract and renders the defaulting party incapable of performance or makes it impossible for him to carry out the contract as intended.[17] Not every slight or partial dereliction of one party will entitle the other to rescind or abrogate a contract.[18] A mere mistake on the part of the seller in carrying out his part of the contract not prejudicial to the buyer,[19] as by delivery of the wrong article,[20] or a mistake as to the terms of payment,[21] does not justify a rescission. The conduct of the seller must be such as to show a disposition or intent to repudiate the obligation of the contract,[22] as where the seller disposes of the property to a third person,[23] delivers something entirely different from that agreed to be delivered,[24] or refuses to adhere to the original terms of payment.[25] But

Agreement not to sell to other dealers.— A breach by the seller of a provision of the contract, that he will not, for four months, sell similar goods to any person other than defendant, is a ground for the rescission of the contract by the buyer, although the stipulated time for the payment expired within the four months. Conduct not constituting a breach.—Where property is sold payable in instalments, a refusal by the vendor to give a receipt for a payment made will not justify a rescission by the vendee, even if a receipt is required by the contract. Weintz v. Hafner, 78 Ill. 27. A contract for the sale of a stock of goods, "to be invoiced at cost and as agreed upon," cannot be rescinded merely because the seller failed to produce the original bills of certain of the goods on demand. Kendall v. Young, 27 Ill. App. 174.

Election to stand on contract.— Where the vendee in a sale on credit becomes insolvent the seller may insist upon cash payment, and on the refusal of the vendee to accept and pay for the goods may resort to a resale to protect his interest. This action on the part of the seller does not give the vendee the right to rescind, as it is not a repudiation of the contract by the vendor but an election to stand on the contract. Pratt v. S. even in such case if the contract is wholly executed the purchaser must stand on his rights under the contract.[26]

(B) Failure to Deliver. The buyer may rescind if the seller fails to make delivery of the goods in accordance with the terms of the contract.[27] If, however, the failure to deliver is due to no fault of the seller there can be no rescission.[28] Where delivery is to be made in instalments a failure to deliver an instalment will not ordinarily be ground for rescission,[29] although under particular circumstances it may furnish evidence of an intention not to be further bound by the agreed terms of the contract.[30] But if there is a failure of delivery as to the first instalment,[31] or the failure to deliver is a continuing one,[32] the buyer may rescind.

(C) Failure of or Defect in Title. The buyer may rescind because of a failure of or a defect in the title of the seller to the property sold,[33] as where the property

Time of shipment.—Where one contracted to sell a specific cargo of wheat, described in a bought and sold note as shipped by a certain vessel as per bill of lading dated September or October, and which was all on board at the date of the contract, this did not amount to a condition so as to entitle the buyer to rescind the contract, on its turning out that the wheat was not shipped at the time mentioned. (D) Defect in Quantity. The buyer may rescind for defect in the quantity of the goods delivered,[38] but not where the defect is due merely to ordinary loss or breakage in transportation, as such loss is considered as contemplated by the contract.[39]

(E) Defect in Quality. According to the weight of authority the buyer may within a reasonable time rescind if the goods delivered are not of the quality represented.[40] If, however, the contract so provides the seller must be given an opportunity to replace the goods or remedy the defect,[41] and in one case it was held that this was necessary even though there was no provision in the contract to that effect.[42]

(F) Breach of Warranty. In the case of executory contracts of sale, the buyer may rescind for a breach of warranty, whether or not the seller has been guilty of fraud.[43] According to the weight of authority the buyer cannot, in the absence of fraud or an agreement giving him the right, rescind an executed contract of sale for a breach of warranty, his remedy in such case being on the warranty.[44] The breach of warranty neither rescinds the sale nor gives the vendee a right to rescind, but merely a right of action for damages.[45] There are, however, many decisions holding that the buyer may rescind an executed contract merely on the ground that there has been a breach of warranty, and it seems to be the established rule in some jurisdictions,[46] although in some cases it is insisted that the seller an opportunity to replace. St. Louis Paper-Box Co. v. J. C. Huhinger Bros. Co., 100 Fed. 595, 40 C. C. A. 577.

must be given an opportunity to remedy the defect.[47] Even in those jurisdictions where the right to rescind for breach of warranty is denied it is nevertheless held that there may be a rescission if the false warranty is accompanied by fraud,[48] or there is an agreement to take back the articles if not as warranted.[49]

But see Crafts v. Belden, 99 Mass. 535, where under the provisions of Gen. St. c. 127, § 2, cl. 5, it was held that if an assignee in insolvency, in suing the buyer of goods sold by the debtor, with a view to an unlawful preference, joins a count in contract for the price with a count in tort for their existence of ground of rescission will not operate as an estoppel,[65] and generally there must be knowledge of the existence of grounds of rescission in order that the conduct of the seller shall estop him.[66] The acceptance of a check in part payment will not estop the seller to rescind for the buyer's failure to pay for instalments,[67] nor is he estopped to rescind because he already has security for the purchase-price,[68] nor because after default he expresses a desire for performance, where the purchaser does not accede but insists on immediate delivery without the notice to which the seller is entitled.[69] So also an estoppel as to one ground of rescission will not operate as an estoppel as to other grounds.[70]

b. Of Buyer. The buyer may be estopped to rescind if without objection he accepts the goods,[71] and pays part of the purchase-price,[72] or requests an extension of time for payment,[73] and especially will an acceptance of the goods operate as an estoppel if the buyer has examined or has had an opportunity to examine them before acceptance.[74] So too retaining the goods without objection after conversion it is not a waiver of his right to rescind the sale, when it appears that all the counts were intended to disaffirm it.

Dismissal of action.— The fact that the action was dismissed does not avoid the effect as an estoppel. Bach v. Tuch, 126 N. Y. 53, 26 N. E. 1019 [affirming 10 N. Y. Suppl. 884].

Where defendant gave plaintiff written notice that it rescinded the contract of sale for breach by plaintiff of a covenant to pay for all goods within sixty days, and plaintiff replied, inclosing a check for the amount then due, such fact did not show a waiver by defendant of the right to rescind in the absence of a showing that it received the check, or of what became of it, or that, if it did receive the check, defendant took it unconditionally. Incidental use.— Where plaintiff, after notifying defendant of a rescission of a purchase of a horse, which defendant refused to accept, placed the horse in a livery stable, and made no use of him except to drive him at intervals for exercise, he did not thereby exercise such dominion over the horse as to waive his right to insist on the rescission. Faust v. Koers, 111 Mo. App. 560, 86 S. W. 278.

Refusal of seller to accept.— Where the purchaser offers to restore the property and to rescind the sale after the discovery of the fraud but the seller refuses to accept the property and declines to rescind the sale, the title is reinvested in the seller and the subsequent retention and use of the property by the purchaser will not operate as a ratification of the sale as previously rescinded and the purchaser may then be held to retain the property,[77] will estop the buyer to rescind. But a retention of the goods in ignorance of the existence of grounds for rescission,[78] or until the buyer has taken advice as to his rights,[79] or for the purpose of preserving the property from loss or destruction,[80] will not operate as an estoppel. The right to rescind is not affected by the destruction [81] or depreciation of the property not due to the fault of the buyer,[82] unless due to a defect known to him to exist at the time of the sale.[83] And where the goods purchased are confiscated by the government for failure to pay customs duties the buyer is not estopped to rescind because he appears in the proceedings to condemn the goods and claims title thereto.[84] Of course if the buyer elects to affirm the sale [85] and resort to another remedy [86] he cannot rescind. And he is estopped to rescind for default in delivery if he has granted an extension of time,[87] or if the default is occasioned by his own failure to perform.[88]

Sufficiency of offer.— Where A, desiring to rescind a contract with B, said to him: "I will give you back the notes, and you will give me back the goods," to which B replied: "I won't do that; not at present, anyhow," this was a sufficient offer by A to rescind, and a formal tender of the notes was not necessary. Leon v. Goldsmith, 69 Ill. App. 22.

Independent sales.—Where the sale sought to be rescinded consists of several purchases, the seller is entitled to treat them as independent sales; and all payments made on account may be applied to the first purchase, unless otherwise designated by the purchaser, and the seller would be entitled to rescind the other sales, without returning or offering to return the payments received on the first. Friend Bros. Clothing Co. v. Hulbert, 98 Wis. 183, 73 N. W. 784.

Nothing due buyer.— In order to rescind a contract of sale for non-payment of the price the seller must ordinarily tender so much of the price as has been paid, but where it seems likely that in final judgment there will be nothing due the buyer, such tender need not be made. What is reasonable time.— Where part of to rescind is generally regarded as made in time.[96] To be valid it is not absolutely necessary that the tender should be made to the buyer. It may be made to a general assignee who has possession and control of the goods.[97] In determining the amount to be returned or tendered the seller may deduct the value of the use of the property,[98] and need not include either the amount paid by the buyer as duty on the goods imported,[99] revenue taxes,[1] or expenses incurred by the buyer to other parties in furtherance of a scheme to defraud the seller;[2] but freight which under the contract was to be deducted from the price must be returned.[3] It is no excuse for failure to return notes given for the purchase-price that they are worthless,[4] and there can of course be no rescission if the seller himself has made it impossible to restore the consideration.[5] But a restoration of the consideration is excused where the buyer has sold the goods, retaining the money received therefor,[6] or where the goods have been damaged by the fault of the buyer to an

See 43 Cent. Dig. tit. "Sales," § 273.

Offer to produce notes in court for cancellation.— Where the seller stops goods in transit, rescinds the sale, and refuses to deliver, it is sufficient if, in a suit by the purchaser for the possession of the goods, the seller in his answer professes a readiness and makes an offer to produce in court for cancellation the notes given for the purchase-price. Fulton v. Thompson, 18 Tex. 278, such offer being held sufficient where the purchaser did not ask for the inspection of the notes before trial.

Limitation of rule.— Some decisions place a limitation on the rule, holding that a seller who received notes of third parties as part of the price cannot, on the ground that the notes are worthless, excuse his failure to return or tender them before rescission of the sale. Crossen v. Murphy, 31 Oreg. 114, 49 Pac. 858.

Interpleader.— Where a vendor seeks to rescind a contract of sale for fraud of the vendee, and is subsequently made plaintiff in an interpleader issue to determine the ownership of the goods sold, a tender by him at the trial of the issue, of notes given by the vendee in payment will be treated as if made at the date of rescission. Sloane v. Shiffer, 156 Pa. St. 59, 27 Atl. 67.

amount equal to the price.[7] Such restoration is also excused where the buyer has absconded.[8]

(II) DEMAND. If rescission was not declared at the time of default, demand is necessary as a condition precedent to rescission for non-payment of price.[9]

b. By Buyer [10] — (I) RESTORATION OF PROPERTY — (A) Duty to Restore. The general rule that to justify a rescission the parties must be placed in statu quo applies when rescission is sought by the buyer.[11] The rule that the parties must be placed in statu quo does not require an absolute and literal restoration of the parties to their former condition, but it is sufficient if such restoration is made as is reasonably possible and such as the merits of the case demand.[12] The buyer must as a condition precedent to rescission restore or offer to restore the property,[13]

Replevin for goods sold.— Where a portion of the goods have been sold, and replevin has been brought for the balance, defendant in replevin may, in consideration of the reduction of the amount of the claim property bond, waive the return of the purchase-money paid and agree that the replevin shall stand for the purpose of determining the balance due. Arbuthnot v. Smith, 18 Pa. Super. Ct. 22.

Goods in custodia legis.— In Pennsylvania it has been held that consideration must be returned, although the goods are in the custody of the sheriff under execution (Schwartz v. McCloskey, 156 Pa. Rescission for fraud.— Although one exercising the right of rescission must in general put the other party in statu quo, in cases of fraud, the defrauded party may rescind within a reasonable time after discovering the fraud, although the parties cannot be restored to their former position. Downer v. Smith, 32 Vt. 1, 76 Am. Dec. 148. Where the return of the property will not place the seller in statu quo, the rescission and return is not authorized unless the representations inducing the contract were made with intent to deceive. Curran v. Hauser, 9 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 468, 6 Ohio N. P. 281 [affirmed in 61 Ohio St. 641, 57 N. E. 1132].

The buyer is bound only to put the seller in as good condition as he was before.— Therefore where plaintiff, a tenant at will, agreed to vacate the premises in favor of defendant, if the latter would pay him for certain fixtures the sum he, plaintiff, had paid for them, and falsely represented as such sum an amount larger than the price he had actually paid, and defendant gave his note for the excessive amount, and received a lease for a term of years and possession of the premises from the landlord, defendant could not be required, as a condition of rescission for the fraud, to surrender the lease or assign it to plaintiff, as this would place plaintiff in a better condition than he was before. Returning identical property.— In Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. 868, it was said that the buyer must return the identical goods. And in Cohen v. Ellis, 52 Hun (N. Y.) 133, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 133, it was held that a purchaser of bonds could not rescind his contract on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentations by the vendor, inducing the purchase by returning other bonds issued upon the organization of a new company to succeed to the business of the corporation issuing the first bonds, although the new bonds were worth more than the old. On the other hand it was held in Schultz v. O'Rourke, 18 Mont. 418, 45 Pac. 634, that where one has purchased two thousand five hundred shares of stock and seeks to rescind the contract, it is no defense to the action that he has sold a part of the identical shares to a third person, since other shares of equal value could be returned in their stead.

Where property sold is damaged while in the possession of the purchaser without his fault, he is not obliged in order to rescind the sale to repair the damage before rede-

But when goods sold by sample are delivered in instalments it is not necessary on rejection of certain instalments because not corresponding to the sample to return those already accepted.[18] If an actual return or tender of the goods is practicable a mere offer to return or notice that the goods are subject to the seller's order is ordinarily not sufficient,[19] but there must be an actual return or tender of the goods,[20] although an offer to return is generally regarded as sufficient when the parties are at a distance from each other and an actual manual delivery is impracticable.[21] The return or tender must be unconditional,[22] and for the purpose of rescission.[23] The return or tender of the goods must be made by one having authority to make it,[24] and must be made to the seller or his authorized representative.[25] Moreover the buyer must generally return or offer to return livery or offer of redelivery to the vendor. Pitcher v. Webber, 103 Me. 101, 68 Atl. 593; Smith v. Hale, 158 Mass. 178, 33 N. E. 493, 35 Am. St. Rep. 485.

Incorporeal thing.—A purchaser of a right to vend a churn, given by parol, seeking to rescind the sale, sufficiently shows an offer to return the thing sold by alleging that he had offered to rescind the contract of sale. Rice v. Gilbreath, 119 Ala. 424, 24 So. 421.

Sale of letters patent.— To effect a rescission of sale, and recover back the purchase-price of letters patent declared to be invalid, it is only necessary that the vendee reassign and offer to return the letters. Sandage v. Studabaker Bros. Mfg. Co., 142 Ind. 148, 41 N. E. 380, 51 Am. St. Rep. 165, 34 L. R. A. 363.

Refusal to accept goods.— Where a party contracts to manufacture specific goods, and delivers goods of a kind not conforming to the contract, and the buyer without delay informs the seller of that fact, and refuses to accept them, and does not use any of them, he need not manually return such rejected goods; but it is sufficient, to relieve him from liability to pay for them, if in due time he give the seller clearly to understand that he refuses to accept them. Rheinstrom v. Steiner, 69 Ohio St. 452, 69 N. E. 745, 100 Am. St. Rep. 699.

Goods on trial.— In an action to rescind a contract for the purchase of a piano on account of fraudulent representations where the evidence showed that, before plaintiff had decided to purchase the piano, defendant took it to her house without her consent or request, and was allowed to leave it on trial; that thereafter plaintiff purchased it and paid the consideration therefor; and that it remained there down to the week of the trial, a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no proof that plaintiff was in condition to return the piano at the time of trial, was not warranted, as the presumption is that it remained there for defendant. Illustration.— It is not necessary that there should be a return of, or an offer to return, a horse which was purchased in a foreign market, to which he was taken and sold, when in a distant state his unsoundness is discovered. Carter v. Stennet, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 250.

23. Churchill v. Price, 44 Wis. 540.

Purpose of return.— The return of a piano by plaintiffs to the seller for purposes of repair does not constitute an attempt to restore the status quo, in furtherance of a purpose to rescind the contract of sale. Tilley v. Montelius Piano Co., 15 Colo. App. 204, 61 Pac. 483.

24. Authority to return.—A claim that a sale was rescinded, which is based upon an instruction from the husband of the buyer to the seller to come and take the goods away, cannot be sustained in the absence of proof that the husband had authority to give such instruction. Hornberger v. Feder, 30 Misc. (N. Y.) 121, 61 N. Y. Suppl. 865.

25. Parsons Band-Cutter, etc., Co. v. Mallinger, 122 Iowa 703, 98 N. W. 580, holding that it is not necessary that the agent who negotiated the sale, and to whom tender was made, should agree to or acquiesce therein, but that it is sufficient if he at that time continued to represent his principal as when the sale was made. Compare Rutter v. Dowagiac Mfg. Co., 102 Minn. 367, 113 N. W. 910. In this case plaintiff purchased a seed drill from an agent of defendant under a contract providing that, if it did not work well, notice should be given to defendant or its agent, and if it could not be made to work, it should be returned to the agent, and the cash the property to the place where the sale was consummated by delivery.[26] The return or tender must be made in a reasonable time,[27] and should be accompanied by an offer of compensation for the intermediate use of the property.[28]

(c) Excuse For Failure to Return. The failure of the buyer to restore the property as a condition precedent to rescission will be excused if the property is worthless,[29] and not rightly an article of sale or merchandise,[30] or if actual tender and notes given therefor returned to the purchaser. Plaintiff claimed that the drill would not work, and that he rescinded the sale and returned the drill and sued for the amount of his note. It was held that notice to the agent that the drill did not work and its return to him were sufficient compliance with the contract, although the party was not defendant's agent at the time.

Delivery to third person.— The delivery of a machine by the purchaser to a third person, to be delivered to the seller, is insufficient to rescind the contract, where such third person retained possession and merely notified the sellers by letter concerning the machine. McCormick v. Barry, 10 Nebr. 207, 4 N. W. 1014.

W. 546, holding that in order to relieve a purchaser of lumber from liability to accept after finding that it does not conform to the contract in dimensions and quality, it is not necessary for him to take it back to the depot to which it had been shipped, and from which he had removed it to his house, but that he discharges his duty by notifying the seller of the defects, and removing the lumber to some suitable and convenient place of his own selection, where it can be safely kept for the seller until he shall pay the advanced freight charges and take it into possession.

Reasonable time.— Where the buyers of goods, delivered under an agreement to hold them subject to the orders of the seller, if not satisfactory, returned the goods to the seller, after holding them a reasonable time, and using reasonable efforts to ascertain his wishes in regard to them, they did all that was required in the rescission of the agreement. Wahlert v. Weisberg, 70 Mo. App. 368.

Tender at trial.— Where plaintiff sued to cancel a sale for fraudulent representations within a month after discovering the fraud, and in the meantime did nothing in affirmance of the sale or to mislead defendant, and in his complaint offered to return the property and tendered it on the trial, an objection that he could not maintain his action because he did not tender a return thereof before bringing suit was untenable. Chisholm v. Eisenhuth, 69 N. Y. App. Div. 134, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 496.

Waiver of delay.— If the delay was unreasonable and unwarranted the seller could waive the same; and whether he did so waive it was, under the facts, a question for the jury. Collins v. Tigner, 5 Pennew. (Del.) 345, 60 Atl. 978. Where there are grounds for rescission of a sale by the purchaser, the fact that he delays returning a portion of the property is immaterial if, when it is returned, it is accepted by the other party without objection as to time. Aultman v. Miller, 52 Kan. 60, 34 Pac. 404.

Effect of statute of limitations.—Although, under the laws of Louisiana, the buyer has one year in which to bring his redhibitory action for the rescission of the sale for vice or defect in the thing sold, this does not affect the operation of the rule of law which requires the buyer in such cases to offer to return the property within a reasonable time. Possibility of repair.—Although machinery purchased for six hundred dollars is, in its present condition, inefficient and worthless, yet where, by undisputed testimony, it appears that by the expenditure of fifty dollars it can be repaired and made to perform good work, it is not worthless so as to entitle the purchaser to keep it without paying for it. Trippe v. McLain, 87 Ga. 536, 13 S. E. 523.

is impracticable,[31] or if the seller has rendered a tender useless by some act or declaration,[32] such as a refusal to receive the property if tendered.[33]

(II) Tender of Balance Due. If money paid in advance by the buyer is to be forfeited in case the residue is not paid by a certain day, he must tender, or use his best endeavor to tender, the balance on or before the day limited in order to place the seller in default, so as to entitle the buyer to rescind and recover the advance payment.[34] But when the seller is already in default no tender of the balance due is necessary.[35]

That a return is impracticable at the time of instituting suit is not a sufficient excuse for want of tender, if it was practicable at any time between the discovery of the vice and the institution of the suit, or even before the trial. Lewis v. Morgan, 14 La. Ann. 401.

Sale of fixtures.— The failure to return an article purchased, after discovery of alleged defects, cannot be excused under the claim that it is a fixture attached to the purchaser's building, where it appears that there is nothing to prevent its removal, if unsatisfactory. Sale at instance of seller.—A rescission by the buyer of an executed sale of certain bonds for fraud cannot be defeated by the seller on the ground that the buyer has parted with the bonds, and so cannot restore the statu quo, where he parted with them on the advice of the seller. Laches.— A purchaser of stock in a company who, as an inducement to the purchase, is given employment by it, loses his right attending it,[44] such as the nature of the objection,[45] the location of the parties with respect to each other,[46] and the like.[47] Whether the right to rescind was to disaffirm the purchase for fraud where, for a long time after obtaining knowledge of the facts, he continues in the employment, and fails to take any steps toward disaffirmance. Zimmele v. American Plaster Board Co., 1 N. Y. App. Div. 327, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 183.

Immediate rescission unnecessary.— To preserve a right to rescind a sale, it is not necessary to rescind immediately on the first discovery of a material misrepresentation, but the purchaser may waive that, and yet rescind on a subsequent discovery of other material misrepresentations. Mastin v. Bartholomew, 41 Colo. 328, 92 Pac. 682 (citing CONTRACTS, 9 Cyc 435); Pitcher v. Webber, 103 Me. 101, 68 Atl. 593.

Illustrations.— Where the vendor of a yoke of oxen represented them to be only seven years old, and the purchaser on the second day after the sale heard a farmer's opinion that they were much older, but continued five days longer to use them and then returned them, the right to rescind was exercised within a reasonable time. Matteson v. Holt, 45 Vt. 336. Evidence that the buyer refused to take the horses as soon as he saw them, and that, in his first conversation with the seller as soon as he saw him, he refused to take them, is sufficient to show that he acted promptly in disaffirming the contract. Schofield v. Conley, 126 Mich. 712, 86 N. W. 129. Where the buyer discovered the fraud the first week after buying a business, and notified the seller and demanded a return of his money, which was refused; and he carried on the business two months longer, when he rescinded absolutely, he had not forfeited his right to rescind. Boles v. Merrill, 173 Mass. 491, 53 N. E. 894, 73 Am. St. Rep. 308. Where the seller is a non-resident, and the purchaser does not know his place of business, or any agent to whom a tender can be made, an offer to return the implement, made six months after the purchase, to the first agent authorized to collect the notes given for the price, is in time. Gale Sulky Harrow Mfg. Co. v. Stark, 45 Kan. 606, 26 Pac. 8, 23 Am. St. Rep. 739. Where the sellers of a stock of goods misrepresented that there were no debts, the purchasers did not wait more than a reasonable time before electing to rescind, although they learned on the night the invoice was begun that there was one debt, and a few days later learned of others, and continued to run the store for several days. Laches.— Where merchandise brokers present to purchasers a memorandum of the sale, or "bought note," which is accepted by them, the latter cannot repudiate the sale seven days after part of the goods are shipped, and two days after they received invoices of such shipment, because the sellers did not give a certain guaranty required by the purchasers' contract with the brokers. Numsen v. Levi, (Cal. 1894) 36 Pac. 657. In an action by the receiver of a bank on a note given by defendant in payment of stock issued him, defendant could not set up fraud on the part of the bank in procuring him to subscribe for such stock, in order to avoid the note, where he failed to elect to rescind the contract until after suit was instituted against him, and after the rights of the bank's creditors to its assets had attached. exercised within a reasonable time is usually regarded as a question for the jury;[48] but the time may be so short or so long as to justify the court in pronouncing it reasonable or unreasonable as a matter of law.[49] The time within which the right is exercised must be computed from the discovery of the fraud or defect on which rescission is based and not from the date of the sale.[50] But the buyer must use reasonable diligence to ascertain the facts,[51] especially if there is anything to put him on inquiry.[52] An inspection, trial, or test to determine whether the goods are of the quality specified must be made within a reasonable time,[53]

Applications of rule.— When goods are bought as corresponding to samples, and so appear, a reasonable delay in examining is proper; but, when they are not supposed to conform to samples, great promptness is required on the part of the vendee both in examining and rescinding the sale with as little delay as the usual methods of business will permit. Farrington v. Smith, 77 Mich. 550, 43 N. W. 927. Where a party agrees to furnish at a fixed price a certain quantity of bags capable of holding two bushels each, and delivers bags of a smaller size, which the agent of the vendee fills, sews up, and carries to a warehouse, where they remain six or eight days, when the vendee for the first time sees them, and then notifies the vendor that they are not of the proper capacity, and on the sale day takes them back to the vendor, who refuses to receive them, the delay was not unreasonable either on the agreement or on the common count in assumpsit. Waldo v. Halsey, 48 N. C. 107. Where goods sold are delivered in three shipments, and each lot is inspected within ten days after its arrival, and the vendor notified of the rejection of the whole one month after the arrival of the first shipment, the delay in inspection and rejection is so great as to be held unreasonable as a matter of law. Pierson v. Crooks, 115 N. Y. 539, 22 N. E. 349, 12 Am. St. Rep. 831. The purchaser of a horse represented to be sound has the right to retain the horse a sufficient length of time fully to establish whether or not he is sound, and, if not sound, whether the unsoundness is of such a nature as to seriously affect his value for the use for which he was purchased, and if the purchaser takes no longer time than is reasonably necessary, his offer to return is seasonable. Gridley v. Glove Tobacco Co., 71 Mich. 528, 39 N. W. 754.

Custom as to time of inspection.— On a purchase of goods by a dealer from a wholesale merchant in original packages with special reference to a usage or custom not to examine the goods until opened by the dealers to sell to customers, an examination made by the purchaser upon his opening packages to sell to customers is within a reasonable time, provided the goods are opened for sale in due course of trade. Doane v. Dunham, 79 Ill. 131.

and the buyer is guilty of laches precluding rescission if he delays making such inspection or test for an unreasonable time.[54] A delay on the part of the buyer in exercising his right to rescind will, however, be excused if it is due to the promises of the seller that the defect would be remedied,[55] or his requests that further trial be made,[56] or other acts and declarations of the seller tending to induce delay.[57]

c. Where Contract Gives Option to Rescind. Where there is an option in the contract to rescind, if the time within which the option can be exercised is prescribed, such condition must be complied with,[58] and a failure to comply therewith terminates the option and the sale becomes absolute.[59] In any event the option must be exercised within a reasonable time.[60]

9. Acts Constituting Rescission.[61] The intention to exercise the right of rescission must be shown either by notice,[62] clearly indicating the pur-

sion.[69] On the part of the buyer, a refusal to accept the goods when tendered for delivery,[70] unless retracted before the seller has acted thereon,[71] amounts to a rescission.[72] So too a return or tender of the property by the buyer operates as a rescission [73] if made for that purpose.[74] But a mere offer to rescind by either party unaccepted cannot have effect as a rescission,[75] unless there is an absolute right of rescission.[76] In any event acts relied on as constituting a rescission of the contract must have been performed by the party or his authorized agent.[77] Whether the acts of the parties have been such as to amount to a rescission is for the jury.[78]

10. Action For Rescission — a. In General. Rescission of the contract of sale by action is properly within the jurisdiction of equity,[79] and will not as a rule be granted in an action on the contract which should be treated as void.[80]

Denial of grounds of rescission.— But an acceptance of the goods tendered if accompanied by an absolute denial of the grounds of rescission and a tender back after examination is not a rescission. Schultz v. Bradley, 4 Daly (N. Y.) 29 [reversed on other grounds in 57 N. Y. 646].

Resale by purchaser.— A contract for the sale of oil, to be delivered on ten days' notice by the purchaser, is not rescinded by a subsequent sale of the oil by the purchaser through brokers at a price less than that of the previous contract, at which the former seller became the purchaser, the oil not having passed out of his actual possession. Form of action.— An action by the buyer of a warranted machine, brought, after he had returned it, against the vendor and his guarantor, alleging its return and claiming recovery of a greater amount than the selling

The purchaser may, however, in an action by the seller to enforce his lien obtain a rescission by cross bill.[81] But on the failure of his action to rescind the purchaser cannot change his action to one for damages or diminution of price.[82] It is no defense to the action that the ground of rescission was removed after the suit was brought;[83] and in an action by the buyer of a business his incompetency to manage it is not a defense.[84]

b. Pleading and Evidence. In an action to rescind the party seeking rescission must plead,[85] and prove the grounds of rescission.[86] If the purchaser brings suit to rescind after a great lapse of time the question of his right is not one of waiver, but of election, and therefore defendant need not plead that plaintiff waived his right to rescind.[87] Fraud will not be presumed,[88] but the proof need not be direct and positive.[89] The fraud may be shown by circumstances [90] and declarations of the parties,[91] and it is not necessary that the proof should show fraud beyond a reasonable doubt.[92] If the fraud is based on misrepresentations it must be shown what the false statement was; [93] and when false statements as to financial condition are relied on, the falsity of the statements may be shown by judicial records,[94] or by statements made to a commercial agency,[95] if it is also shown that the buyer made such statements.[96]

cable in actions to rescind.[98] The judgment in the action to rescind should correspond to the demand in the complaint,[99] and must correspond to the findings.[1] If the property has been disposed of by the buyer a judgment for the value or price is proper, and it need not be in the alternative.[2] Otherwise the judgment should order a return of the property, and if it does not a new trial should be granted.[3]

11. Operation and Effect of Rescission. A rescission, whether by agreement or in invitum, terminates all the rights of the parties under the original contract,[4] and they cannot be revived except by the assent of both parties.[5] The title to the goods is revested in the seller,[6] and he cannot maintain an action for the

98. Instructions.— In actions to rescind a sale an instruction predicated on the assumption that plaintiff did not rely on the false representations of defendant is properly refused where there is no evidence on which to base such assumption. Richardson-Roberts-Byrne Dry-Goods Co. v. Goodkind, 22 Mont. 462, 56 Pac. 1079; Crutcher v. Schick, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 676, 32 S. W. 75. And since the sufficiency of the evidence is for the jury to determine an instruction on the weight of evidence is erroneous. Willis v. Strickland, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 50 S. W. 159.

Questions of law.— Where there is no conflict in the evidence as to the facts, and it appears that the time which has elapsed between a knowledge by the buyer of the defects in the article warranted and the time of the attempted rescission is so great that under no circumstances appearing in the evidence the jury will be warranted in holding a rescission within a reasonable time, the court may decide the question as a matter of law and deny the purchaser's right to rescind. Mattauch v. Riddell Automobile Co., 138 Iowa 22, 115 N. W. 509.

Directing verdict.— Where the right to rescind is based on the buyer's false statements as to his financial condition it is error to direct a verdict for plaintiff because the financial statement was false as the question to be determined is whether the statement showed the buyer to be solvent when in fact he was insolvent. Meyers v. Bloon, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 554, 50 S. W. 217.

Form.— Defendants, owners of a second mortgage which was without consideration, assigned it to J under an agreement that he should sell it and pay them one thousand dollars. By means of fraudulent representations, J induced plaintiff to sell him clothing, subject to an examination of the title to the mortgaged land, which was made, on the request and at the expense of J, by a title company. Defendants waived the payment of the one thousand dollars by J, and agreed to accept a bill of sale of the clothing as security therefor, and also as security for the sum of five hundred dollars to be advanced by them in payment of interest due on the first mortgage, and of two hundred and fifty dollars to be advanced by them for examination of the title and for charges on the goods. It was held that if defendants were injured by the act of J, that was no reason why plaintiff, in enforcing his rights, should pay the sum which J agreed to pay them for the second mortgage and the seven hundred and fifty dollars advanced by them, and there was no objection to the form of a decree failing to provide for such payment by plaintiff. Costs.— In an action by a vendee to rescind the contract of sale for fraud, the court may, in its order that the sale and conveyances be set aside, and that an accounting between the parties be had before a referee, also adjudge that the vendor pay the costs so far as accrued, although no final judgment has been rendered. Where the consideration for the sale of a piano was two hundred dollars in money and an organ, a judgment for the vendee in an action for the rescission of the contract, for the amount of the consideration, although it operates to leave the seller in possession of both the organ and piano, is not a contravention of the rules that a contract cannot be partly affirmed and partly rescinded. himself in the wrong;[16] nor can he recover damages for a breach of the contract of sale[17] or for freight paid.[18] The buyer is entitled to compensation for the expense of keeping the property for the seller after a tender thereof,[19] but not for an indefinite time.[20] If the property tendered is not accepted the buyer should resell on the seller's account,[21] and in such case he is responsible only for the proceeds,[22] any loss falling on the vendor.[23]

V. PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.[24]

A. In General — 1. Title of Seller — a. In General. It is essential to the performance of the contract so as to render the buyer liable for the price that the seller should transfer to him a valid title to the goods.[25] It does not, however, affect the sufficiency of the performance that the seller is not the actual owner or does not convey his own title,[26] or that he is not in possession.[27] The obligation of the seller is fulfilled if he conveys a good marketable title,[28] and if he is in a position to transfer such a title the buyer cannot avoid liability by a refusal to accept in the absence of other objection.[29]

the property is such a defect in the title as will avoid the buyer's liability,[30] and it is immaterial that the person holding the lien is willing to waive it.[31] But the mere fact that there is a lien of record will not have that result if it is not in fact an enforceable lien.[32] So also the successful interposition of an adverse claim to the property is a defect in title relieving the buyer from liability;[33] but even when the seller's title is defective if he has acted in good faith the buyer cannot maintain an action as for failure to perform, or resist payment of the purchase-money so long as he is undisturbed in his possession.[34] Knowledge on the part of the buyer of a defect in the seller's title before the sale estops him from raising that objection to the sufficiency of the performance.[35]

delivery of a bill of sale is not, unless required by agreement, necessary to a performance by the seller.[39] The statute may, however, require that the sale of particular kinds of property shall be by bill of sale.[40] It is not essential that the writing should be in any particular form so long as it shows an intent to transfer the property for a consideration.[41] The writing may be in the form of a receipt acknowledging payment of the consideration for the property therein described;[42] but it must show a present transfer,[43] although it is not essential that it should recite the fact of delivery of the property.[44]

b. Execution and Delivery. The bill of sale must be duly executed,[45] but it is not necessary that it should be executed by both parties in order to be binding on both.[46] To operate as a transfer of the property the bill of sale must be delivered,[47] and possession of the instrument is usually sufficient evidence of delivery;[48] but delivery will not be presumed from possession if it appears that there was never any intent on the part of the seller to give possession or to deliver.[49] And generally any act of the seller to be considered as showing delivery must be accompanied by a clear intent to deliver.[50]

c. Filing or Recording.[51] As between the parties to a sale, as a general rule, it is not necessary to the validity thereof that a bill of sale of the goods be recorded;[52] and as between the parties recording it is not necessary, although intended as security and not as an absolute conveyance.[53] Under some statutes, however, a bill of sale of certain kinds of property (cattle running on a range) must be recorded or it does not take effect in favor of any one for any purpose,[54] at least unless the vendee has received and actually taken possession.[55]

d. Operation and Effect. A bill of sale is generally conclusive on both parties,[56] although it is signed by the seller only.[57] It conveys a good title as against the seller or any one claiming under him,[58] entitling the buyer to immediate possession.[59]

3. Performance of Conditions. If a condition is imposed on one of the parties to the sale, as a condition precedent to the performance by the other party, there must be a full and complete performance of such condition to put such other party in default,[60] unless such performance is waived.[61] If no time is fixed for the performance of conditions they must be performed within a reasonable time.[62] If conditions are concurrent or dependent neither party can maintain an action for breach by the other party without showing performance of conditions on his own part, or an offer to perform, although it is not certain from the terms which is to do the first act.[63] In the case of independent agreements the failure to perform is not such a breach as terminates the liability of the other party but it gives him a right to sue for or recoup his damages.[64]

B. Delivery — 1. In General. The term "delivery" is used in the law of sales in very different senses, being used in some instances to denote a change of title and in others to denote change of possession.[65] Delivery as denoting change of title is treated elsewhere in this article.[66] The present discussion is concerned only with delivery as effecting a change of possession in performance of the contract.

2. Obligation to Deliver. If payment according to the terms of the contract is a condition precedent there is no obligation to deliver until payment is made.[67] But as a general rule the obligation of the seller to deliver the goods and of the buyer to pay the price are concurrent conditions. This is of course true where the contract of sale so provides,[68] and delivery and payment are concurrent conditions where no time of payment and delivery is agreed on,[69] where the contract is silent as to the time of payment,[70] where there is no stipulation for delay on either side,[71] or where no time is specified for delivery.[72] While it is not incumbent on the seller to deliver until the buyer is ready to pay,[73] yet it is as much the duty of the seller to deliver as for the buyer to accept and pay for the goods,[74] and the right of the seller to enforce the contract depends on his showing performance,[75] or an offer to perform,[76] or a readiness and willingness to perform.[77] The obligation of the seller to deliver may be fixed by payment [78] or by tender of payment with demand and notice to deliver.[79] If under the terms of the contract the obligation to deliver is absolute, the seller cannot impose an additional condition on delivery.[80] There is no obligation to deliver when the contract has been definitely repudiated by the buyer,[81] or where he insists on conditions not contemplated by the contract.[82]

3. Demand, Notice, or Tender by Buyer — a. In General. In order to put the seller in default for non-delivery a demand on the part of the buyer is usually necessary when the obligations of the parties are concurrent,[83] or the goods are deliverable at the request of the buyer,[84] or are to be called for by him,[85] as when the delivery is to be made at the residence or place of business of the seller.[86] If no time is fixed for delivery the buyer must make demand,[87] and, if delivery is to be made on or before a certain day at the option of the buyer, demand is necessary to put the seller in default before that day.[88] A readiness to receive the goods and pay the price is, however, sufficient without a demand if by the terms of the contract the goods are deliverable within a certain fixed time,[89] or are deliver-

b. Notice. If the buyer is to designate the place of delivery or the vessel on which the goods are to be delivered, such designation is a condition precedent to the obligation of the seller and must be made,[92] and notice given thereof,[93] and of the buyer's readiness to receive the goods.[94] So too if the buyer is to designate the quantity to be delivered at any particular time,[95] and if no particular quality is contracted for but the buyer is given the option to designate the size or quality of the articles to be furnished, he must give notice to the seller of the size and quality desired.[96] If the contract provides that shipment shall be made at such time as the buyer may direct, and contrary to such provision shipment is made immediately without directions from the buyer he is not liable on the contract unless he waives the premature shipment and accepts the goods.[97]

c. Tender of Payment. While a payment or tender of the price amounts to a demand,[98] it is not necessary that a demand should be accompanied by an actual tender of the price;[99] but it is generally sufficient that the buyer is ready and willing to receive the goods and pay the price.[1]

time,[3] although this requirement may be and is waived if no objection is made on that ground.[4] If by the terms of the contract the purchaser is to give notice of the place of delivery, the notice should be given such length of time before the date fixed for delivery as to enable the seller to comply with the terms of the contract.[5] Where notice of readiness to receive delivery is sent by mail, nothing being said as to the method of giving notice, the seller is not bound by such notice until actual receipt thereof, and is not in default in making delivery if he acts promptly thereafter.[6]

e. Circumstances Excusing Demand or Tender. As the law does not require one to do a thing which is vain and fruitless,[7] demand or tender of payment is excused if the seller has repudiated the contract; [8] but the refusal must be explicit and positive.[9] A demand or tender by the buyer is excused if to the knowledge of the buyer the seller has sold the goods to a third person,[10] or by assignment has put it out of his power to deliver,[11] or if the seller cannot be found.[12] A tender of the price is also excused if measurement is necessary to determine the amount due and it is not made within the time specified.[13]

4. Readiness to Deliver and Notice Thereof — a. Ability and Readiness to Deliver. Although under the terms of the contract there is no absolute obligation on the seller to deliver,[14] yet in order to put the buyer in default he must be in a position to perform or show a readiness so to do,[15] and if he is able, ready, and willing to deliver it is a performance so far as the seller is concerned.[16] On the other hand if by reason of his negligence he is unable to perform,[17] or has put it out of his power to perform, as by a sale of the property to a third person, it is a breach of his contract.[18]

b. Notice. The seller must give notice of his readiness to deliver if he has agreed to do so,[19] or if there is uncertainty as to the place [20] or time [21] of delivery, or if delivery is to be made at the option of the seller,[22] and a sufficient notice will fix the liability of the buyer.[23] against the buyers, for their failure to take the property. Bishops v. McNary, 2 B. Mon. (Ky.) 132, 36 Am. Dec. 592. Where a contract for the sale of growing hops provided for their delivery between September 20 and October 20, payment to be made on delivery and acceptance, a delivery of a portion of the hops during the time specified, with notice by the seller of his readiness to deliver the balance, was sufficient notice to the purchasers as to the date when the hops would be delivered to render them liable for the agreed price on the delivery and acceptance of the balance two days later. Meeker v. Johnson, 5 Wash. 718, 32 Pac. 772, 34 Pac. 148.

5. Tender of Delivery or Offer to Perform — a. In General. An offer on the part of the seller to perform his part of the contract by delivery of the goods is sufficient to fix the liability of the buyer.[24] The offer must, however, be in the form of an actual tender of performance,[25] and a mere readiness to make a tender in the absence of the buyer is not sufficient.[26] But if the seller attends at the place of delivery and the buyer does not appear a formal tender is not necessary.[27] The tender to be effective must be unconditional,[28] conforming to the terms of the contract,[29] and must be made at the time and place mentioned in the con-

Notice held insufficient.— Where a contract for the sale and removal by the buyer of five buildings bound the buyer to complete the removal within fifteen days, and to start within twenty-four hours' notice, a notice given the buyer to take possession of and remove three buildings was ineffective, as against the buyer, for any purpose. Lippman v. Hauben, 47 Misc. (N. Y.) 668, 94 N. Y. Suppl. 520. Vendors of hogs covenanted to deliver a fixed number in pens to be selected by them within ten miles of a certain place. A notice to the vendees that they would deliver a portion of the hogs at a certain place at a fixed date was not sufficient on the presumption that when the vendee arrived at such place he would receive a notice of delivery at the same or some other suitable place of the balance of the hogs. McNairy v. Bishop, 8 Dana (Ky.) 150.

Time of giving notice.—A notice left at the residence of a purchaser, on the fourteenth of the month, when he was absent on business in another county, of an intended delivery on the sixteenth, was insufficient. tract.[30] Even if delivery at the designated time and place is impossible the seller is bound to tender the best delivery possible.[31] If the goods are so bulky and ponderous or of such a nature that actual physical tender is impossible, an offer to deliver is a substantial performance,[32] or the tender may be symbolical, as by a tender of a warehouse receipt [33] or of a sample of the goods.[34]

c. See also Re Keighley, 7 Aspin. 418, 70 L. T. Rep. N. S. 155.

Delivery to person designated by buyer.— So where the buyer ordered a machine to be delivered to A for him and six machines ex-

quality, a tender of a larger quantity of different grades from which the purchaser might with great labor select the proper quantity of the specified quality is not a sufficient tender.[39] A tender of goods not conforming to the requirements of the contract as to quality is not a sufficient tender,[40] although such a tender may be made good by a subsequent tender of proper goods.[41]

d. Waiver of Tender. No tender is necessary when the contract has been definitely repudiated by the buyer,[42] as by a refusal to accept delivery if tendered,[43] or notice to the seller that the buyer is unable to accept and pay for the goods.[44] So too when the contract provides that the buyer shall from time to time specify the sizes and styles of the articles wanted a refusal to specify dispenses with the necessity of a tender.[45] And it has been held that where the contract of sale is to deliver a definite quantity of goods during a year's time, a certain number of carloads to be shipped each month on orders given by the purchaser, and the purchaser fails to give orders for a number of car-loads, it is prima facie not necessary for the seller in order to save himself from being in default to tender such car-loads at the purchaser's residence or place of business.[46]

6. Place of Delivery — a. When Place Is Designated. Under a contract of sale which provides for delivery at a specified place, a delivery at such place must be made to fix the liability of the buyer,[47] and it is not sufficient that the goods actly alike were delivered to A for six purchasers, this was a sufficient tender, as it was not necessary that one particular one should be set apart for the buyer or marked with his name, he being offered the liberty to select any one of the six. Ganson v. Madigan, 9 Wis. 146.

Delivery at warehouse.—A covenant to deliver goods at a warehouse does not require the covenantor to put them in the warehouse. Duckham v. Smith, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 372.

Delivery alongside vessel.— Where the con-are ready for delivery at another place near by.[48] Generally the fact that the goods are to be inspected or weighed at another place will not affect the rule;[49] but the rule is subject to exception when the right to inspect carries with it the right to reject,[50] or other circumstances render it necessary to construe the contract as providing for delivery at the place of inspecting and measuring.[51]

b. Where No Place Is Designated. In the absence of any provision in the contract fixing a place for delivery the general rule is that the delivery shall be made at the place where the goods are at the time of the sale,[52] and this will usually be the place of business of the seller,[53] or of manufacture,[54] or of shipment.[55] The rule may, however, be modified by circumstances,[56] a custom of the trade,[57] or the understanding of the parties that delivery shall be made at the place of business or warehouse of the buyer.[58] So too if the goods are bulky and cumbersome, tract provides for delivery alongside a vessel to be provided by the purchaser a delivery on the wharf before the vessel arrives is not a compliance with the contract. McCandish v. Newman, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 268.

Designation in the alternative.—Where a contract of sale specified that delivery should be made to a certain railway, which ran through two places, where the sellers maintained their business office and factory, respectively, delivery to the railway at the factory, instead of at the place where the sellers' business office was located, constituted a sufficient delivery under the contract. Baird v. Pratt, 6 Indian Terr. 38, 89 S. W. 648.

Option to make other delivery.— Where the contract for the sale of ice stipulated that at least three fourths of the quantity sold should be stored in designated houses, the ice to become defendant's property when cut, provided, however, that plaintiff should have a right "to make up the quantity to be delivered as aforesaid by purchase or otherwise," indemnifying defendant for any additional expense occasioned thereby, any ice purchased under the proviso need not be stored in such houses, but might be delivered elsewhere, the seller paying any additional expense thereby caused. c. Appointment of Place. The contract may confer upon the buyer the right to appoint the place of delivery,[60] and in such case if the buyer fails to make a designation the seller is excused.[61] Thus if the delivery is to be made on the buyer's vessel, the buyer must name the ship,[62] and notify the seller of her location.[63] If the contract provides in general terms that delivery is to be made in a certain city, the buyer has the right to fix the particular place within such city where delivery shall be made.[64] If the place of delivery is at the seller's option, he must make the designation and notify the buyer in order to fix his liability;[65] and if delivery is to be made by a designated time he must exercise his option within the time permitted.[66] In any event notice of the appointment of a place of delivery must be given within a reasonable time,[67] and a delivery at the place designated is of course a complete discharge of the seller's obligation.[68]

Compliance with designation.—Where a contract to deliver five thousand barrels of oil at points on a railroad provides that the place of delivery shall be designated by the buyer, upon his designating a station whose siding has not room to hold the requisite cars, the seller may properly put the oil on the nearest sidings, ready to be moved thither as soon as room is made for it; and it is the buyer's duty to be ready to receive and pay for the oil at the time stated in his notice. Lockhart v. Bonsall, 77 Pa. St. 53. The mere arrival of goods at a wharf within the limits of a city, where delivery was to be made at a place therein to be designated by the buyers, does not constitute a delivery to the buyers, where they had designated a is ordinarily the place of delivery,[69] but by the terms of the agreement the place of delivery may be fixed at the town or city where the buyer resides or does business,[70] or at his place of business,[71] and in such case a delivery at the carrier's station or terminal in that town is usually sufficient,[72] although no notice was given to the buyer of the arrival of the goods.[73] Thus a delivery "on track" at a certain city is complete when the cars are left in the general receiving yards and it is not necessary that the cars should be placed on tracks running to the buyer's warehouse.[74] Ordinarily when goods are to be shipped by the seller and at his expense, to the place of business of the buyer, such place is the place of delivery;[75] but the prepayment of freight by the seller does not conclusively show that the place of delivery is the buyer's place of business.[76] Similarly if the agreement is to sell goods "f. o. b." at a designated place such place will ordinarily be regarded as the place of delivery;[77] but the effect of the "f. o. b." depends on the connection in which it is used, and if used in connection with the different place of delivery. Morel v. Stearns, 43 Misc. (N. Y.) 639, 88 N. Y. Suppl. 416.

words fixing the price only it will not be construed as fixing the place of delivery.[78]

e. Waiver of Place. The acceptance of the goods at a place other than the place designated for the delivery is a waiver of delivery at such place.[79] The mere silence of the buyer as to the proper place of delivery, although with intent to mislead the seller, will not estop him to insist on delivery at the place designated, if in fact the seller was not misled.[80] If the seller agrees to deliver and keep on hand a designated quantity of the goods sold at plaintiff's place of business at all times, the requirement is not waived by the fact that the buyer contracts with a third party to freight, insure, unload, or haul and store the goods.[81]

f. Evidence. If the parties to a contract for the delivery of goods at a certain place, enter into a second contract for the delivery of another lot of the same goods, in which no place of delivery is mentioned, it will be presumed that the same place of delivery was intended.[82] Where the seller and buyer live in different places the burden is on the buyer in an action for the price to show that delivery was to be made at his place of business.[83]

g. Questions For Jury. Where the contract fails to designate the place of delivery the question should be left to the jury,[84] and where delivery is by carrier it is for the jury to determine whether the delivery was to be made at the buyer's place of business or to the carrier only.[85]

Compare Gude v. H. J. Bailey Co., 4 Ga. App. 226, 61 S. E. 135, holding that under Civ. Code (1895), § 3675, subd. 8, declaring that time is not, generally, of the essence of a contract, but may become so by express stipulation or reasonable construction, where a contract of sale of personal property fixes a time for delivery, it is a question of construction whether in the particular case the time fixed for delivery is a material part of the contract.

When a date for delivery is mentioned in a contract of sale, the goods must be delivered on that day, and, if not, the purchaser may usually refuse to accept a subsequent tender; and in ordinary cases, where no specified time for delivery is mentioned, delivery must be made within a reasonable time after the making of the contract. Delivery "within six weeks."— Defendant on April 28, 1903, ordered by letter from plaintiff a certain number of frames to be delivered within six weeks. This order was accepted, and on May 8 defendant ordered another lot of frames, writing on the foot of his letter of April 28: "Note. Increase the above order to 5 M. of each." It was held that the second order should be construed as made on the same terms as the first, and that plaintiff was bound to deliver all the goods within six weeks. Robert Gair Co. v. Armstrong, 107 N. Y. Suppl. 5.

"During next two months."—A contract dated June 17 providing for delivery "during the next two months" allowed the seller the entire months of July and August in which to make delivery. Bissell v. Beard, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 740.

Purpose for which articles are intended.— Under a contract for the sale of brick to be used in building a sewer "delivery at the rate of three hundred thousand bricks per month" does not require the seller to deliver three hundred thousand brick early enough in each month to enable the buyer to lay them within the same month, but as the contract for building the sewer called for its completion by August 1, the seller must deliver the last instalment in time to complete the sewer by that date. Consolidated Coal, etc., Co. v. Mercer, 16 Ind. App. 504, 44 N. E. 1005.

Delivery in instalments.— Under a contract to sell five hundred and sixty tons of coal, to be delivered as plaintiffs might order, not more than two hundred tons to be ordered in any one month, the contract being signed September 12, and the first order, made in September, being for two hundred tons, defendants had a month from that date in which carrier at the usual place on that day is good, although the buyer did not actually receive the goods until the next day.[96]

(III) HOUR OF DELIVERY. As a general rule the seller has the whole of the day named in which to deliver,[97] especially if the buyer is present to receive the goods,[98] and there is time to weigh and inspect the goods so as to complete the delivery before midnight.[99] If, however, time must be allowed for the examination of the goods by daylight, delivery must be made before sunset.[1] So too the parties may by their contract limit the hour of delivery, and where the contract provides for delivery during the first half of a month of thirty-one days delivery must be made by noon of the sixteenth day.[2]

(IV) SHIPMENT BY CARRIER. Where the contract provides that the goods are to be shipped within a certain period, the time of shipment is usually regarded as material,[3] and it is not a compliance with the contract if the goods are shipped before [4] or after the time specified.[5] The contract is, however, satisfied if the goods are on board the car or vessel, and it does not require that the car shall leave the station or the vessel clear and sail within such period, if the seller believes that transit will begin in a reasonable time.[6] Where goods were ordered for to deliver the two hundred tons. Johnson v. Allen, 78 Ala. 387, 56 Am. Rep. 34.

Rep. 871, where a contract for shipment in June and (or) July, seller's option, was construed to mean that the goods must be loaded so as to sail in those months and not that the goods must be loaded in those months.

Construction of contract.— Where defendants contracted to purchase from plaintiff one half the cargo per Wachusett, "chartered to load" not exceeding twenty-two hundred tons nitrate of soda, to arrive at New York, "bought to be a March and or April shipment" from the west coast of South America; and it was the custom of the trade, known to both parties, for the vendor to sell after having entered into an executory contract for the purchase of the product on the west coast of South America, to be delivered there or shipped according to order, the words, "bought to be a March and or April shipment," referred to the original purchase by plaintiff, and did not bind plaintiff to ship the goods during those months. Browne v. Paterson, 165 N. Y. 460, 59 N. E. 296 [reversing 36 N. Y. App. Div. 167, 55 N. Y. Suppl. 404]. A contract by a lumber dealer of Lowell "to furnish all the lumber for Rodman's house in Roxbury, delivered in Boston, first floor to be delivered on the cars by the first day of August next," is fulfilled by a delivery on the cars at Lowell, by the first day of August, of a sufficient portion of the lumber for the first floor, although it does not reach Boston until after that day. Allen v. Kimball, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 268. Defendant sold and agreed to deliver to plaintiff one hundred thousand barrels of cement, and delivery on a certain date at a point so distant that they could not possibly have reached the place at that date, a shipment on that date will be sufficient.[7]

(v) PREMATURE DELIVERY. When the time of delivery is fixed it is not as a rule a sufficient performance if the seller delivers the goeds before such time.[8] The buyer may, however, waive objection for premature delivery by acceptance of the goods.[9]

b. When Time Is Not Fixed by Contract — (I) IN GENERAL. When the time of delivery is not fixed or is stated in general and indefinite terms, time is not of the essence of the contract.[10] The law implies, however, that if no time is fixed, delivery shall be made within a reasonable time,[11] in the absence of anything to plaintiff to receive and pay for the same. One half was to be delivered the first year, and the remainder the following year, at either one of two ports on Lake Superior, at plaintiff's option. The contract contained the following provision: "Shipments to be made [by defendant] after navigation opens and continue throughout the season in 5,000 to 10,000 barrel lots as required by said second party [plaintiff]; shipments to be made on or before October 15th of each year. Said second party shall give 30 days' notice of shipments to be made, in advance." It was held that such provision contemplated shipments by water in five thousand to ten thousand barrel lots throughout the season; that the provision for notice was for the benefit of both parties, and required plaintiff to give thirty days' notice in advance of each of such shipments, especially in view of another provision for tests of the cement requiring twenty-eight days' time, and the taking of samples for such tests at the factory "approximately on the date that notice of shipment is given." Alpena Portland Cement Co. v. Backus, 156 Fed. 944, 84 C. C. A. 444.

Prompt shipment.—A stipulation for prompt shipment is not complied with by placing the goods on board a vessel in a port blockaded by ice. Tobias v. Lissberger, 105 N. Y. 404, 12 N. E. 13, 59 Am. Rep. 509.

Shipment from seaboard.—Where a contract for sale of grain requires shipment from seaboard not later than April, a delivery to an agent of a steamship company in St. Louis at any time during the month is not sufficient, as the seller was obligated to get the grain to port in time for it to be shipped from there in April. James v. Crown Cereal Co., 90 Mo. App. 227.

Mode of shipment.—A contract to ship goods "at Manila per sailing vessel . . . direct to New York or via Hong Kong, during . . . April or May," requires the goods to be on board a sailing vessel within the time specified, and a shipment at Manila in May, on steamer for Hong Kong, and transhipment to a sailing vessel at the latter port in June, is not a compliance therewith. Lefferts v. Weld, 167 Mass. 531, 46 N. E. 107. But compare Thornton v. Simpson, Holt N. P. 164, 3 E. C. L. 72, 2 Marsh. 267, 6 Taunt. 556, 1 E. C. L. 752, where a contract for shipment, "the ship's name to be declared as soon as known," was construed as allowing shipment in more than one vessel.

show that an immediate delivery is intended.[12] But that an immediate delivery is intended may appear from the terms of the contract,[13] or the circumstances attending the transaction;[14] and if such intent does appear time is of the essence of the contract.[15] So too when the time of delivery is referred to in general or indefinite terms the contract will be construed reasonably in view of the circumstances.[16] Where goods are to be delivered "by the first boat" it is sufficient to send them by the first boat that receives general freight, although a boat under special charter had sailed before.[17] A contract to deliver during "the season" requires a delivery during the current season only.[18] A contract to deliver for "spring

Consequential damages.— Where the purchaser of a pipe intended for a ditch in course of construction notified the seller that, if it was not delivered at once, there was danger of the caving in of the ditch and the seller agreed to deliver at once, without notifying the purchaser that in the event of his failure to do so he would not be liable for any damages occasioned by the delay, these were facts from which the jury might have found an implied agreement by the seller to assume the special liability for damages caused by his negligent delay in failing to deliver the pipe, and the fact that the purchaser makes no attempt to get the pipe elsewhere, but relies on the promise of the seller to immediately furnish it, although he knows the ditch is in danger of caving in, is not such negligence as will prevent a recovery for damages by the caving in of the ditch, which results from the negligence of the seller in failing to deliver the pipe, which was sold by the latter with a knowledge of the circumstances. Smith v. Snyder, 82 Va. 614.

Applications of rule.—A contract for delivery "about Nov. 1" is complied with by delivery on November 10 (White v. McMillan, 114 N. C. 349, 19 S. E. 234. And see O'Brien v. Higley, 162 Ind. 316, 70 N. shipment" requires at least that delivery should be made before July 1.[19] In construing such indefinite expression as to time the purpose for which the goods are intended will be taken into consideration. For example a sale of coal "for the winter trade" requires delivery to be made before the end of March;[20] and a sale of fruit trees to be delivered "this fall" requires that delivery shall be made at a time suitable for planting.[21]

(II) DELIVERY "IMMEDIATELY" OR "AT ONCE." A delivery to be made "immediately" or "at once" must be made without delay or as promptly as circumstances, in view of the usual course of business, will permit.[22] That is to say the delivery must be made within a reasonable time.[23]

(III) DELIVERY "AS SOON AS POSSIBLE," "EARLIEST POSSIBLE." When the contract provides for delivery "as soon as possible" the seller is entitled to a reasonable time,[24] in view of all the circumstances,[25] such as the necessities of manufacture,[26] or of putting the goods in condition for delivery.[27] The term does not mean immediately or that the seller must stop all his other work and

Illustrations.— Defendants ordered a safe from plaintiff to be shipped "as soon as possible." Upon receipt of the order plaintiff had no finished safes on hand, but rushed to completion one in process of manufacture, using all proper diligence, and shipping it nineteen days after receipt of the order. It appeared that the customary time for filling an order by the manufacture of a new safe was thirty days. It was held that the shipment was a substantial compliance with the order. Victor Safe, etc., Co. v. O'Neil, 48 Wash. 176, 93 Pac. 214. So under a contract to deliver as soon as possible after September 15, a delivery on November 15 was held sufficient. Modification of contract as to quantity.— That a contract for the sale of one engine to be shipped as soon as possible was modified by substituting two engines for the one originally contracted for did not change the requirement that the same should be shipped as soon as possible. Berry v. Fairbanks, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 112 S. W. 427.

Evidence.—Where a written contract for the sale of an engine called for delivery "as soon as possible," parol evidence that the seller's agent was advised by the buyer of the importance to the buyer of the greatest expedition in shipping the engine by reason of the harvesting season which would begin at a designated date was admissible to enable the court to construe the quoted clause, and to enable the jury to determine whether the undertaking was performed within the meaning of the contract. Berry v. Fairbanks, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 112 S. W. 427.

Question for jury.—Whether a seller in a contract for the sale of an engine, to be shipped as soon as possible, complied with the contract, is a mixed question of fact and law, and the court should interpret the meaning of the contract, and the jury should apply the evidence in the determination of whether or not the undertaking was performed within the meaning of the contract. devote himself to that particular order.[28] But the seller must nevertheless act with all reasonable diligence or without unreasonable delay.[29] It has been held that a requirement that the shipment of goods should be the "earliest possible" must be construed as meaning that the goods should be sent as soon as the seller could possibly send them, and that it signified rather more than that the goods should be sent within a reasonable time.[30]

(IV) DELIVERY "SHORTLY." In a contract for the sale of personal property to be delivered "shortly," it is the duty of the seller to tender delivery within a reasonable time, and if he tenders delivery after such time the buyer may reject.[31]

(V) RIGHT TO APPOINT TIME OF DELIVERY — (A) Buyer's Option. Where delivery is to be made at the buyer's option, the seller has no right to deliver and the buyer is not obliged to receive the goods until his option is exercised,[32] it being the duty of the buyer to notify the seller to make delivery.[33] Where the time of delivery is at the option of the buyer he must at least exercise his right within a reasonable time,[34] and the seller is entitled to a reasonable time after notice to make delivery,[35] but he cannot delay delivery beyond a reasonable time.[36] If delivery is to be made on or before a certain day at the option of the buyer, the seller has until such last day to make delivery, in absence of any demand by the buyer,[37] and the failure of the buyer to exercise his option is equivalent to a demand for delivery on the last day.[38] The buyer may demand deliveries from time to time as he needs the goods,[39] or he may order the whole to be delivered at any time within the period fixed;[40] but he must at least order deliveries so that they may be complete at the expiration of the period.[41]

(B) Seller's Option. If the seller is given the option of delivering the goods at any time within a stated period he must to bind the buyer give notice of his election to deliver before the last day of the period or such last day will be the day of delivery,[42] in which case no notice is necessary.[43] If no time is fixed but the seller is given the option of delivery he must notify the buyer of his election,[44] and the buyer is not bound to receive the goods unless notice is given.[45] The notice must be given within a reasonable time,[46] and the seller must make delivery within a reasonable time;[47] but if he fixes the time of delivery on a certain day he must deliver on that day.[48]

Waiver of Delay — (1) In General. The buyer may waive a failure to deliver in time by his acts and declarations,[56] as by objecting to the delivery on other grounds,[57] by failing to object with knowledge of the delay,[58] by requesting or consenting to a delay,[59] by requesting an extension of time for payment because

Delay in shipment held reasonable.—Where the circumstances showed that the goods were wanted immediately and they could have been shipped within a day or two, a delay of a week or ten days was reasonable. Robinson v. Brooks, 40 Fed. 525. A shipment of wheat on June 13 is not a compliance with a contract entered into on May 25, which calls for the delivery of the wheat at a certain place "as soon as possible" by lake transportation, although vessels for transportation are difficult to obtain, where the usual time of lake transportation is six days, and but a few hours are required to load the wheat for shipment, and where the sellers knew at the time of making the contract that vessel room was difficult to obtain, and shipped wheat to third persons between the date of the contract and the date of shipment, some of it being on other contracts made after that in question. Arthur v. Wright, 57 Hun (N. Y.) 22, 10 N. Y. Suppl. 368 [affirmed in 132 N. Y. 547, 30 N. E. 865]. A delay of eighteen days in making shipment on an order received May 1 for goods wanted by May 30 was reasonable. Rhoades v. Cotton, 90 Me. 453, 38 Atl. 367. See also Fisher v. Boynton, 87 Me. 395, 32 Atl. 995, when a delay of nineteen days was held to be reasonable. Where a contract for the purchase of a car-load of flour was made, by telegraph, between Stanfold and Quebec, on the twenty-seventh of May, and the flour was not put on board the cars for conveyance to defendant until the twenty-seventh of June, and only actually tendered for delivery at Stanfold on the twentieth of July, the delay was reasonable. of the delay,[60] or by demanding delivery after the time specified,[61] provided the demand is complied with according to its terms.[62] If the delay is once waived the right to insist on delivery within the specified time cannot be reasserted;[63] but where there is a failure to deliver within the time specified, and a new contract is made by which the seller becomes entitled to be paid for only such of the goods as the buyer can use, and he declines the goods and the buyer is unable to use them the seller cannot recover therefor.[64] And an offer to waive damages resulting from the breach of a contract as to time of performance, on condition that the other party thereafter make prompt delivery, becomes a valid agreement only on compliance with the condition.[65]

(II) By Acceptance. In many cases the general rule has been laid down so far as the buyer's obligation to pay the price is concerned that an acceptance of the goods waives the objection that they were not delivered in time,[66] especially when the acceptance is without protest.[67] According to many decisions, however, mere acceptance does not of itself waive the buyer's claim for damages because of delay in delivery.[68] And this is necessarily so when the acceptance is accompanied by a reservation of the right to claim damages.[69] Acceptance may, however, be regarded as evidence of a waiver,[70] although to constitute an absolute waiver it must be under circumstances clearly manifesting an intent to waive,[71] such as payment of the price.[72] So too when the acceptance is forced by stress of circumstances, the goods being absolutely needed, and the buyer being unable to procure them elsewhere, acceptance will not waive damages for delay.[73] While the acceptance of a part of the goods waives delay in the delivery of such portion,[74] it does not bind the buyer to accept subsequent delayed deliveries.[75]

d. Evidence. Where the delivery is to be made within a certain period the burden is on the seller to show that he was ready to deliver on the last day.[76] If delivery is to be made during the season evidence that the seller shipped other cargoes is competent as tending to show that he could have obtained the necessary vessels before the season closed;[77] and when the buyer is to furnish the vessel evidence as to whether he sent a vessel to the place at the time specified is admissible to show whether there was an extension of time.[78] Generally evidence merely explanatory of the delay in delivery is immaterial.[79]

e. Questions For Jury. Where the delivery depends on the time of shipment, the time when the vessel sailed is a question for the jury.[80] So too where delivery is to be made on demand, the question as to the exact time when demand should be made is for the jury.[81] If under the contract delivery is to be made in a reasonable time, what is a reasonable time is usually regarded as a question for the jury;[82] and so too is the question whether delivery was made at a reasonable hour.[83] Whether there has been a waiver of delay in delivering is also a question for the jury.[84]

8. What Constitutes Delivery[85] — a. In General. No particular act or formal ceremony is necessary to make a delivery. Turning cattle into pasture.— Where range stock is the subject of a contract of sale, the gathering together of the stock and turning it out of the inclosed pasture of the seller into the inclosed pasture of the purchaser is a sufficient delivery. Woods v. Faurot, 14 Okla. 171, 77 Pac. 346.

business to which the transaction is incident,[88] and the circumstances attending the transaction.[89] The law does not require the parties to the sale to perform acts extremely inconvenient if not impossible.[90] But while an actual manual delivery may not be necessary,[91] especially where the sale is of bulky and cumbersome articles,[92] yet mere words are not sufficient to transfer possession but must be accompanied by some act to effect a change of possession.[93] The acts or circumstances which are to be regarded as tantamount to delivery must be of such a character as to indicate an actual intent to change the possession,[94] and this implies in addition to the intent of the seller to deliver an intent on the part of the buyer to receive and accept,[95] although he need not take manual possession.[96] Generally if a particular mode of delivery is stipulated for in the contract that mode must be followed.[97]

b. Actual or Constructive Delivery. The word "delivery" in the law of sales may signify either an actual or a constructive delivery.[98] Actual delivery consists in giving to the buyer or his servants or accredited agent the real possession of the goods sold.[99] Constructive delivery comprehends all of those acts which, although not truly conferring real possession of the goods sold, have been held constructione juris equivalent to acts of real delivery,[1] and in this sense includes symbolical or substituted delivery.[2] Both actual and constructive delivery contemplate the absolute giving up of the control and custody of the goods on the part of the seller and the assumption of the same by the buyer.[3]

c. Persons to Whom Delivery May Be Made. A delivery in performance of the contract must be to the buyer,[4] or in the case of joint buyers to one of them,[5] or to the assignee of the contract of sale in the absence of instructions to the contrary,[6] or to the accredited agent of the buyer.[7] A delivery to a third person cannot operate as a delivery to the buyer,[8] unless it is made at the request of the buyer,[9] and to a person appointed by the buyer to receive the goods,[10] such as a warehouseman.[11] A delivery to the officer and the application of the goods to the payment of the buyer's debts in garnishment proceedings may also be regarded as a complete delivery.[12]

d. Identity of Goods. If the contract calls for specific goods it cannot be performed by the delivery of other goods of like kind,[13] unless performance in

Direction as to delivery by one of two joint vendees.—A delivery of goods described in a contract of sale to one of the vendees, in the name of both as previously directed by the other who was absent at the time of delivery, is a sufficient delivery to both. Blumenthal v. Greenberg, 130 Cal. 384, 62 Pac. 599.

Property divisible.—Where two persons agree to purchase personal property which is divisible into portions alike in quality and value, the vendor cannot treat the contract as the individual promise of each purchaser to take his aliquot share, and, without the consent of all parties, deliver half the property to one purchaser, and recover for the other's refusal to accept the balance. strict compliance with the contract is waived.[14] If, however, the sale is of goods of a certain quality only, and does not refer to specific goods, it is sufficient if the seller delivers goods corresponding to the description.[15] So where the sale is by a manufacturer or producer unless it is especially agreed that the goods shall be of the seller's production or manufacture, it is sufficient if he delivers goods of the proper quality, although he did not produce or manufacture them.[16]

e. Condition of Goods. A contract for the sale of a machine fit for use is not satisfied by delivery in parts,[17] or if it is not at the time of delivery fully equipped to do the work for which it was intended.[18] And a sale of lumber of different dimensions "to be delivered assorted in lengths" requires the seller to assort the lumber in making delivery.[19] On the other hand a sale of a crop of raisins to be cured and delivered at the packing house does not require that the raisins should be cured before being brought to the packing house but is complied with if they are properly cured and packed after arriving there.[20]

Description of goods.—A merchant who ordered needles of a wholesale dealer was not justified in returning the goods without examination because they were shipped as "notions." Coates v. Hurst, 65 Mo. App. 256.

Acceptance of other goods.— Where the owner of iron mines contracted to sell and deliver ores taken from his mines, the fact that the purchaser, during a portion of the period covered by the contract, accepted deliveries of ore not produced from the seller's own mines, did not bind the purchaser to continue to receive such ore in performance of the contract. f. Placing Goods at Disposal of Buyer. As a general rule in the absence of a contrary agreement the seller is not bound to send or carry the goods to the buyer,[21] but he fulfils his obligation by leaving or placing them at the buyer's disposal so that he may remove them without lawful obstruction,[22] especially if manual delivery is impracticable because of the bulk of the articles,[23] in which case it is sufficient if the goods are pointed out to the buyer or he is told to take them away,[24] or, the goods being at a distance from the place of sale, the buyer is told to go and take them.[25] And when goods are manufactured for the buyer it is a sufficient delivery if when completed they are set apart and placed at the disposal or subject to the orders of the buyer.[26] But the goods must be so placed that the buyer has access to them for the purpose of taking possession.[27]

g. Selection and Appropriation.[28] Where the goods sold are part of a large quantity in bulk there is no delivery until the portion sold is selected and appropriated to the buyer.[29] Such selection and appropriation may be indicated by segregating them from the common mass,[30] or by marking them as the property of the buyer.[31] It is not necessary that the exact quantity should be segregated to constitute such selection a delivery.[32] But mere selection and segregation will not operate as delivery if in fact the conduct of the parties is such that no intent of the seller to surrender dominion can be inferred.[33] If the buyer is present and it is then and there agreed that he is entitled to take away from the common mass the quantity sold, weighing and measuring are not essential to a valid delivery.[34] And when specific articles are sold if they are marked as purchased by the buyer and set aside for him this is such an appropriation as will constitute a delivery.[35]

to the purchaser,[44] and nothing further remains to be done by either party to complete the sale.[45] But if something remains to be done to the goods by the seller, there is no delivery.[46] Similarly it does not affect the delivery if the goods remain in the possession of the seller under a contract of hiring,[47] or with permission to use them,[48] or because the seller retains the key to the building in order to have access to goods of his own in the same building.[49]

j. Property in Possession of Third Person.[50] When the goods are at the time of the sale in the possession of a third person actual manual delivery is not necessary,[51] but it is sufficient if the goods are pointed out and turned over to the buyer [52] who arranges with such third person to hold the goods on his behalf.[53] So the payment by the buyer for the pasturage of a horse or his keep in a livery stable, after his purchase, the seller having previously paid therefor, constitutes a constructive delivery of the animal.[54]

k. Transfer of Premises on Which Goods Are Located. Where a vendor of land sells at the same time personal property located thereon, a surrender of possession of the land to the vendee is a sufficient delivery of the personalty,[55] unless there is a stipulation in the contract for a more formal delivery.[56] So when a husband sells personal property on a farm to his wife and abandons the farm to her there is a sufficient delivery;[57] and a tenant by surrendering possession of the leased premises to his landlord sufficiently delivers personal property thereon which he has sold to the landlord.[58]

(IV) RIGHTS AND DUTIES AS TO TRANSPORTATION — (A) Selection of Carrier and Route. Where no particular carrier or route is specified in the contract, the seller may ship the goods by the ordinary means and usual routes of carriage.[76] If, however, the buyer has designated the carrier and route by which shipment shall be made, there can be no valid delivery by carrier unless the seller ships by the designated carrier,[77] from the designated port,[78] and by the

Name of consignor.— It is not essential that there shall be a literal compliance as to the person in whose name as consignor the bill of lading shall be issued. Gray v. Gannon, 6 Thomps. & C. (N. Y.) 245.

Removal of goods by agent of seller.— Where goods are consigned by the seller to himself, care of his agent, the act of the agent in setting up and removing the goods from the car does not constitute a delivery to the carrier. Aultman, etc., Mach. Co. v. Gay, 108 Va. 647, 62 S. E. 946.

Effect of acceptance.— The fact that a vendee accepted a portion of the goods consigned to the vendor was not a waiver of the delivery of the remaining goods consigned to the vendee according to the contract. Van Valkenburgh v. Gregg, 45 Nebr. 654, 63 N. W. 949.

Particular vessel.— Where the contract called for shipment of sugar by a particular vessel, and it was actually loaded on such vessel, the purchaser's duty to receive it was not affected by the fact that, during the voyage, owing to an accident to the vessel, part of the sugar was transferred to another vessel for transportation. designated route,[79] and the goods are properly directed in accordance with the provisions of the contract.[80]

(B) Duty to Furnish Means of Transportation. If the goods are to be delivered to the purchaser at the point of shipment it is generally his duty to furnish the cars or other means of transportation from such point.[81] Thus where the contract is to deliver "f. o. b." at the place of shipment it is prima facie the duty of the buyer to furnish the car or vessel in which the goods shall be shipped.[82] But the agreement when considered in the light of attending circumstances or the construction thereof by the parties may shift the obligation of furnishing the means

Delay in furnishing vessel.— Under a contract to cut cedar posts during the winter of 1871–1872, and deliver them on the rail of vessels to be furnished by the vendees, at a specified price, where the vessels were not furnished until 1874, the purchasers were not entitled to deduct the cost of taking the posts from the beach where the vendors had delivered them for shipping, and placing them on the rail of the vessel. Bolton v. Riddle, 35 Mich. 13.

Delay in loading.— Where the contract required the seller of ice to load each boat within twenty-four hours after arrival, or pay ten dollars per day on each boat after the twenty-four hours expired, and the purchasers, understanding that but one boat could be loaded at a time, hired and sent several boats to get the ice, and the masters demanded no demurrage, the purchasers were not entitled to demurrage for boats not loaded within twenty-four hours after arrival, where several arrived at one time. The rule in Wisconsin.—Although the supreme court of Wisconsin in Boyington v. Sweeney, 77 Wis. 55, 45 N. W. 938, followed the rule laid down in the cases cited above, that case has in effect been overruled and the contrary rule adopted in Vogt v. Shienebeck, 122 Wis. 491, 100 N. W. 820, 106 Am. St. Rep. 989, 67 L. R. A. 756. In this case the court relying on the general rule that one who undertakes to accomplish a certain result, by necessary implication agrees to supply all the means necessary to such result, decided on the authority of John O'Brien Lumber Co. v. Wilkinson, 117 Wis. 468, 94 N. W. 337, that it was the seller's duty to furnish cars for the transportation of the goods under the conditions stated in the text. It is to be remarked, however, that the contract in the case relied on was not a contract of sale but a logging contract under which defendant agreed to cut timber on plaintiffs' land and load the logs on cars. It was further stipulated that delay on the part of the railroad company should extend the time of performance, and that defendant should be liable for damages to the railroad company's equipment due to his negligence. The court regarded the clause as to the effect of defaults due to delays on the part of the railroad company as indicating the intent of the parties that defendant should furnish the cars and distinguished the Boyington case.

of transportation on the seller.[83] If the parties have themselves put a construction upon the contract by one or the other assuming to furnish the cars, this construction will be adopted whether such duty was assumed by the buyer,[84] or by the seller.[85]

(c) Risks of Transportation.[86] Where a particular place of delivery is designated the risk of transportation is generally on the seller,[87] even though the actual transportation is by the purchaser if it is under supervision of the seller.[88] But of course the seller does not bear the risk of transportation after a complete delivery to the buyer,[89] as when delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the buyer.[90] It is the duty of the seller to take usual and reasonable precautions to secure the safe delivery of the goods,[91] and he will be liable for a failure to insure if he is instructed so to do.[92] But he is not liable for failure to insure the goods in the King v. Nelson, 36 Iowa 509.

Where the car is to be loaded by the seller, his responsibility ends when he has properly loaded and delivered it to the carrier. But if he should fail in any particular in properly loading the car and delivering it to the carrier in proper condition and the goods are by reason thereof injured in transit, the buyer is not bound to receive the same, nor does the property in the goods pass to him until the obligation of the shipper is discharged with reasonable care and diligence. Evidence.— Plaintiff sold a car-load of fruit to defendant and agreed to deliver it on the car at the shipping point. It was held that, in an action to recover the contract price in which defendant alleged that plaintiff neglected to take proper care of the fruit in loading it and shipping it, evidence of the general custom of the trade in handling such property was competent for the purpose of showing what was reasonably necessary under the circumstances. Fruit Dispatch Co. v. Sturges, 28 Ohio Cir. Ct. 65 [affirmed in 73 Ohio St. 351, 78 N. E. 1125].

Amount of insurance.— Where the contract provides for insurance the contract price should be regarded as the value for insurance absence of instructions,[93] nor for accepting a bill of lading restricting the liability of the carrier if that was the only way the carrier would accept the goods.[94] The seller will, however, be held liable for his negligence as by shipping by the wrong carrier,[95] by the wrong route,[96] or in a car not designated for transportation of goods of the character shipped.[97] If the goods are misdirected a delivery to the carrier is not a good delivery and the seller is liable for the loss of the goods caused thereby.[98] In the event of delivery at the wrong place the seller must bear the loss if the goods are there destroyed.[99] If the goods are not to be shipped before a certain time and are shipped before that time and are lost the seller must bear the loss,[1] even though the goods were not destroyed until after they had been received by the purchaser, if their destruction was not due to his fault.[2]

m. Symbolical Delivery.[3] When the nature of the goods is such as to render actual delivery impracticable there may be a symbolical delivery.[4] That is to say the possession may be transferred by the delivery of something symbolical of the goods or some indicia of the property,[5] such as giving to the buyer the key purposes. Blodgett v. Foster, 120 Mich. 392, 79 N. W. 625.

Form of policy.— Where the goods sold constitute but part of the cargo an insurance on the whole cargo "free from particular average" is not proper insurance. Hickox v. Adams, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 404. See also Canada Hardware Co. v. Suren-Hartmann Co., 24 Quebec Super. Ct. 430.

Cancellation of policy.— Where after shipping goods which he had sold to B, A procured insurance thereon, which, after the loss of the goods, the company canceled on the ground that B already had a prior insurance on the same, in an action for the price, B was not entitled to recoup the amount of the canceled policy, as, if he had a prior policy, he could recover his loss on that, and if not, the cancellation of the other policy was void, and he could recover thereon. Acceptance of order.— In a few cases the courts have laid stress on the fact that the order had been accepted. Merrick v. Bradley, 19 Md. 50; Stanton v. Small, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 230; Young v. Lambert, L. R. 3 P. C. 142, 39 L. J. P. C. 21, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499, 6 Moore P. C. N. S. 406, 18 Wkly. Rep. 497, 16 Eng. Reprint 779. And it has also been held that there must be a presentment of the order and an agreement of the person in possession to hold the goods thereafter as bailee of the buyer. Edwards v. Meadows, 71 Ala. 42. And see In re Clifford, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,893, 2 Sawy. 428.

Identification of goods.— In D'Armand v. Sheriff, 21 La. Ann. 198, it was said that to constitute a delivery the order must identify the goods. But in Frazer v. Hilliard, 2 Strobh. (S. C.) 309, it was held that a particular description by numbers and marks is not necessary, if the particular parcel intended is otherwise well known.

Property not in possession.— If the property alleged to be in the possession of a third person is not actually in his possession an order for delivery to the buyer is not a delivery of the property. Cofield v. Clark, 2 Colo. 101.

Goods in bond.— Goods in a United States bonded warehouse, on which the duties have not been paid, are not subject to the order of the owner, and an order by the owner for delivery to the buyer, even though presented to and accepted by the warehouseman, will not be good as a symbolical delivery. In re Clifford, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,893, 2 Sawy. 428.

Time of delivery.— In the case of a sale of flour, to be delivered on a certain day, the delivery of an order on a barge, in which the flour is, is not a delivery according to the contract, where the flour is not actually delivered upon the order. Suydam v. Clark, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 133.

Receipt must represent specific goods.— It has been held that if the warehouse receipt does not represent specific goods, but indeterminate goods, such as bales of cotton, to be taken indiscriminately from cotton on hand at the date of the receipt, the delivery of the receipt is not a delivery of the goods. Gragard's Succession, 106 La. 298, 30 So. 885. And see also Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. (Va.) 473, 18 Am. Dec. 726, where stress was laid on the fact that the warehouse receipt identified the goods.

lading,[9] bill of sale,[10] or other documents indicative of ownership,[11] such as an invoice of the goods with an assignment of the goods indorsed upon it,[12] a weigher's certificate,[13] or a ginner's receipt for cotton.[14] So it has been held that the delivery of a part of the goods will operate as a delivery of the whole if such is the intent of the parties;[15] but in the absence of anything to show that such was the intent a delivery of a part will not be so regarded.[16] The mere taking away of an inconsiderable portion as a sample is of course not even a symbolical delivery,[17] although by agreement of the parties the delivery of a sample may be a complete delivery.[18]

n. Evidence.[19] In a contract for the sale of property, the presumption is that the seller has the property on hand and ready to deliver, in the absence of Goods must be free from lien.— To render delivery of a warehouse receipt a good delivery it must appear that the receipt is genuine and that the goods are free from charges. McPherson v. Hall, 44 Ill. 264.

Custom-house permit.—A tender, by the seller of goods, of an unindorsed custom-house permit, authorizing a delivery of the goods by the warehouseman, is a sufficient offer of delivery of the goods, it appearing that the permit was sufficient, if indorsed by the vendor, to enable the buyer to take possession. Where there is nothing to prevent actual delivery it has been held that the delivery of a bill of sale is not effectual as a symbolical delivery. Burge v. Cone, 6 Allen (Mass.) 412.

Cattle roaming at large.— The delivery of a "written descriptive bill of sale" of cattle roaming at large, together with a delivery of the branding iron, is not a delivery of the cattle. Walden v. Murdock, 23 Cal. 540, 83 Am. Dec. 135.

Harding v. Eldridge, 186 Mass. 39, 71 N. E. 115.

Property at different places.— In Williams v. Moore, 5 N. H. 235, it was held that where the property was in different places a delivery of the part at one place did not amount to a delivery of the whole. But in Shurtleff v. Willard, 19 Pick. evidence to the contrary.[20] While there is a presumption that goods charged on the seller's books were delivered, such presumption is disputable,[21] and in accordance with general rules the burden is on the party alleging delivery to prove it.[22] The fact of delivery may be proved by direct testimony,[23] such as the testimony of the person who shipped[24] or delivered the goods.[25] Yet direct testimony is not essential,[26] and delivery may be shown by circumstances,[27] as that the goods were seen in the buyer's possession.[28] Admission by the buyer of the correctness of an account for goods is proof of delivery.[29] Evidence as to former deliveries is admissible to show that a delivery was intended by the acts of the parties.[30] A bill of lading is admissible to show delivery by carrier.[31] Where an order for goods was given, the fact that the order was taken up does not conclusively show delivery.[32]

o. Questions For Jury. Whether the parties intended that the acts should constitute a delivery is for the jury,[33] and so too is the ultimate fact whether there has been a performance of the contract by delivery.[34]

Symbolical delivery.—A symbolical or constructive delivery is a mixed question of law and fact, and entitles either party to ask instructions of the court as to the legal effect of any particular circumstance which may be offered to the jury, and from which

in a contract of sale will be regarded as material.[35] The full quantity contracted for must be delivered at the time and place specified to constitute a sufficient delivery,[36] and the buyer is in general not obliged to accept or pay for a less quantity,[37] the failure of the seller to deliver the quantity specified constituting a total breach of the contract.[38] But under the terms of the contract delivery of all at one time may not be contemplated, and in such case the buyer cannot refuse a partial delivery if it is made in time.[39] If, however, in the case of a deficient delivery the buyer retains the portion delivered he is liable for the part so accepted and retained.[40] Some courts deny the seller's right to recover the delivery is to be deduced. Atwell v. Miller, 6 Md. 10, 61 Am. Dec. 294.

on a partial delivery. Thus in New York the rule has been adopted that on a partial delivery the buyer is not liable for the part delivered in the absence of any waiver of full compliance.[41] The rule has, however, been modified and the seller allowed to recover in cases where the buyer by his conduct has waived a full delivery.[42] The New York rule has been followed in some other jurisdictions.[43]

Time of shipment.—Where, in accordance with a contract, a seller delivers a number of bags of peanuts to a carrier under the contract for shipment on the date fixed, the fact that two days later he placed a number of other bags in the car, with the station agent's consent, and the bill of lading was changed so as to include the latter bags, such transaction in no way delaying shipment, will not prevent recovery for the original number of bags, since such transaction did not work any damage to the buyer. Offer to reduce excess.—Where plaintiff sold defendants ten thousand dollars worth of his stock of goods, and agreed to reduce the stock to that sum by a certain date, when the transfer was to be made, and an invoice taken on the day fixed showed a large excess, which plaintiff proposed to withdraw, in order to reduce the stock to the sum agreed, or to sell defendants on credit, plaintiff's failure to re-

may if he so elects retain the amount designated by the contract and reject the excess [45] no obligation is imposed on him to select the proper quantity out of the excessive quantity delivered but he may reject the whole,[46] especially when the selection of the proper quantity would be troublesome and laborious,[47] or the buyer did not have the privilege of separating and receiving less than the whole quantity shipped.[48] If he elects to retain the whole quantity delivered he is of course bound for the excess.[49] Being entitled to reject the whole if he retains a part less than the amount contracted for he is liable only for the part retained.[50]

b. Quantity Indefinite — (i) In General. If the quantity to be delivered is stated in indefinite terms, merely a maximum and a minimum limit being fixed, to constitute a sufficient delivery the seller must deliver at least the quantity specified as the minimum limit,[51] and within those limits the buyer is bound to accept the delivery,[52] but he is not bound to accept a delivery in excess of the maximum limit;[53] and on the other hand the seller is not obliged to deliver in excess of such limit.[54] If the sale is in bulk the delivery is not insufficient in the absence of fraud because the quantity does not correspond to the estimates.[55] And generally when the quantity is indefinite the acceptance of a certain quantity does not bind the buyer to accept more,[56] but he is of course bound for the amount actually delivered and accepted.[57] If after sale of a cargo of goods, the buyer accepts an offer to sell "another cargo" on certain terms, the words "another cargo" will be construed to mean another cargo of the same quantity as the former one, and the contract is not objectionable for failure to fix the amount of the goods to be furnished.[58]

Sale of animals by weight.—A sale of hogs "to weigh two hundred and twenty-five pounds and over" means that the animals must weigh at least two hundred and twenty-five pounds each. Cash v. Hinkle, 36 Iowa 623. If the contract is that the hogs shall weigh from twenty-five to one hundred pounds the seller can deliver hogs of any weight within those limits. Nixon v. Nixon, 21 Ohio St. 114. When the contract was for the sale of a certain number of hogs "averaging three hundred pounds," it was held to limit only the minimum average and to be complied with by a delivery of hogs averaging three hundred and twenty pounds. Marshall v. Piles, 3 Bush (Ky.) 249. And in Houston v. Miner, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 89, it was held that a contract to sell a certain number of hogs weighing on an average one hundred and eighty pounds was complied with by a delivery of hogs weighing on an average one hundred and ninety-five pounds. See also McCormick v. Hamilton, 23 Gratt. (Va.) 561, holding that each animal should be weighed separately where the contract is for the sale of two hundred hogs, "each to weigh not less than 180 pounds."

(II) "About," "More or Less." If the quantity of goods sold is specified in the contract such specification will be regarded as determinative and is not rendered indefinite because qualified by the words "about" or "more or less."[59] The use of such words merely provides for such slight variations as are necessarily due to accident or to the inherent difficulty of making delivery of the exact quantity sold.[60] While a delivery of a quantity varying materially from the quantity specified is not a good delivery,[61] the delivery of a quantity not varying materially from that specified is a good delivery which the buyer is bound to accept.[62] If, however, the sale is in bulk, the quantity being estimated at "about" a certain quantity "more or less," a delivery of the whole is a good delivery, although the actual quantity is much less or much greater than the quantity specified.[63] A third condition may arise, as where the sale is of such quantity as the buyer may need or the seller may produce in a certain time, estimated at "about" a certain quantity "more or less." In such case the quantity to be delivered and accepted is not the quantity named, nor that quantity with slight variation, but the quantity required by the buyer or produced by the seller.[64]

(III) AS MUCH AS MAY BE REQUIRED. Under a contract to sell all the goods of a certain kind the buyer may order or require, the seller is bound absolutely to deliver such quantity of the specified goods as may be called for by the purchaser,[65] and the purchaser is bound to accept all deliveries tendered within the limits of his requirements.[66] Generally the obligation in either case is not affected by any mere estimate of the quantity that will be needed,[67] although if a maximum limit is fixed the seller is under no obligation to deliver or the buyer to accept a quantity in excess of such limit.[68] The seller may, however, claim the right to deliver up to the limit if within the requirements of the buyer.[69] But the obligation of the seller to deliver is confined to such quantity as may be actually needed by the buyer for the purpose specified,[70] irrespective of any limits that may be fixed by the contract,[71] and he is not obliged to deliver goods for other and speculative purposes,[72] or for a period beyond that named in the contract.[73] The fact that the goods are not actually needed at the time they are ordered does not, however, affect the seller's obligation to deliver.[74] On the other hand the seller is entitled to furnish all the buyer may actually need of the specific goods and not merely such amount as the buyer shall call for.[75] The seller is relieved from making delivery and the buyer from accepting if the latter discontinues the use of the goods [76] or goes out of business as an individual and enters into a partnership.[77]

(IV) SALE OF ENTIRE OUTPUT OR PRODUCTION. A sale of the entire output of a certain article produced by the seller during a specified time binds the seller to deliver and the buyer to accept all that the seller produces.[78] The amount to be delivered is not controlled by any words of mere estimate of the quantity likely to be produced; [79] but if the contract fixes a minimum quantity the seller must deliver at least that quantity.[80]

Time of delivery.—A contract for the sale of the entire output of certain coal mines, at prices payable in monthly instalments, for the coal at the mines, the buyer agreeing to ship and pay for at least a certain quantity per annum, provided so much is furnished him, cannot be construed, because of circumstances existing when it was made, to require him to take the coal monthly, in such quantities as to keep the seller's works and workmen reasonably employed, as they had customarily been and were at the time of the contract. (v) Option as to Quantity. The quantity sold may be at the option of one of the parties. If the option is a general one the obligation to deliver or accept is absolutely at the election of the seller [81] or the buyer,[82] as the case may be. The option may be limited, however, in that either a maximum or a mimimum quantity is specified. In such case if the option is with the seller he is of course bound to deliver at least the mimimum amount,[83] and any additional quantity he may choose to deliver up to the maximum limit.[84] If the option is with the buyer he may require a delivery up to the maximum limit of quantity.[85]

c. Sales by Weight or Measure. As a general rule on a sale by weight or measure statutory weights or measures are understood.[86] But the true value of weights and measures used in specifying the quantity may be varied by agreement,[87] or by the circumstances surrounding the transaction.[88] So where it is agreed that the containers of the goods sold shall be taken as holding a certain quantity, and this method of measurement is pursued for several years, the purchaser cannot subsequently insist that the quantity shall be ascertained by weight.[89] Similarly on a sale of bales of cotton the parties may agree on the exact weight of a bale but if they do not it will be inferred that the parties contemplated bales of the usual weight.[90] In the absence of any agreement or statute fixing the value of weights and measures resort may be had to custom to determine the meaning of the contract.[91] If the measure used to designate the quantity is variable, it will be construed as referring to the average quantity contained in such a measure.[92]

d. "Car-Load" or "Cargo." Where the goods are sold by the "car-load" the term may be construed by the custom of trade,[93] but in the absence of any agreement or particular custom it will ordinarily be held to mean the capacity of a car used for transporting the particular kind of goods sold.[94] So too a sale of a "cargo" of goods means ordinarily the entire load of the vessel,[95] and is limited only by the capacity of the vessel.[96]

e. Delivery in Instalments.[97] Where, under an entire contract, delivery is to be made in instalments a failure to deliver an instalment is a breach of the contract,[98] each failure constituting a distinct breach;[99] but the seller may recover for instalments accepted.[1] If the quantity of each instalment is fixed the buyer is not bound to accept any instalment of less quantity,[2] but if he does accept the less quantity he is liable therefor.[3] On a failure to deliver an instalment the buyer cannot be forced to receive in subsequent instalments a greater quantity than that fixed for an instalment in order that the deficiency may be made up;[4] and on the other hand if the seller at the request of the buyer has delivered less than the quantity called for in any instalment, he cannot be called on to make up all the deficiency in one delivery but is entitled to a reasonable time.[5] When delivery is to be made in two equal instalments an over delivery on the first instalment accepted by the buyer will be carried over on the second instalment.[6] If the goods are of different qualities, the seller is not, in the absence of an agreement so to do, bound to deliver all of one quality in any particular instalment or instalments.[7]

f. Determination of Quantity — (i) In General. In determining the quantity that must be delivered under the contract consideration should be given to the whole contract, including the collateral documents and agreements,[8] the purpose of the transaction,[9] and, if the sale is of goods suitable for a certain market or peculiar to a certain trade, to the custom of such market or trade.[10] Of course in accordance with general rules a practical construction by the parties will control.[11]

(ii) Effect of Special Agreement. If a particular method of ascertaining the quantity delivered is agreed upon by the parties such method will of course be applied and will usually be conclusive on the parties in the absence of fraud.[12] If the quantity is to be determined by measurement by a third per-the same effect Johnson v. Allen, 78 Ala. 387, 56 Am. Rep. 34.

Construction of contract.— In Keefe v. Chaffee, 11 Wash. 292, 39 Pac. 676, it appeared that plaintiff, a shingle manufacturer, wrote defendant that it desired to contract for the sale of the entire output of its mills, and defendant replied, stating that he could use a certain amount of shingles at a certain price. Plaintiff then wired, accepting defendant's "terms," and requesting orders. Defendant, before any shipment was made, wired plaintiff to ship five car-loads, stating that he had written. The letter acknowledged receipt of plaintiff's telegram, and repeated the orders, and also stated that defendant would take one hundred cars at the price named. Plaintiff, after receipt of the telegram and letter, shipped the five cars as directed, and later wrote, acknowledging receipt of the last letter, and stating that it had twenty cars which it would be ready to ship as soon as it could get cars. It was held that the correspondence did not show a contract for the one hundred cars.

Deduction for moisture.—A contract to deliver five hundred tons of copper ore, to be paid for at certain specified prices per ton according to the quality of the ore, to be ascertained by an assay, provided that "the moisture be deducted as usual from the weight of the ore," should be construed as an agreement to deliver that weight of copper in a moist state, the deduction for moisture having reference to the amount to be paid for the ore. Price v. New York, 104 N. Y. App. Div. 198, 93 N. Y. Suppl. 967. Heller v. Ellentown Mfg. Co., 39 Hun (N. Y.) 547. Under a contract to furnish "enough" pine blocks to pave a certain viaduct, payment to be made monthly as son, an actual measurement may be insisted on and the parties will not be bound by a mere estimate;[13] but if an estimate without measurement is agreed on such an estimate will be binding in the absence of fraud.[14] So where the goods are in several packages the whole quantity may be ascertained by determining the quantity in one package and approximating the total quantity.[15]

(III) EVIDENCE. Where the contract provides that weights at the place of delivery shall control, the presumption in the absence of evidence to the contrary is that the same amount which was loaded at the place of shipment reached the place of delivery.[16] Generally the burden is on the seller in an action for the price to show that he delivered the exact quantity called for by the contract;[17] and generally the quantity of goods as billed or entered in the books will be regarded as correct in the absence of a showing to the contrary.[18] Extrinsic evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of determining the quantity of the goods sold,[19]

estimates are allowed by the common council and approved by the mayor for deliveries during the previous month, the quantity to be paid for was to be determined by measurement of the completed work, and not by measurement of the material at the time of delivery. Other purchases.—A question asked of defendant, as a witness, as to when he had bought so large an order before, was proper as showing an improbability that a dealer carrying a small stock in a small town should as by proof of counts made by both parties for the purpose of comparison,[20] way-bills issued by the carrier,[21] and weigh checks issued by the buyer's agent in the usual course of business.[22] And where the sale is in car-load lots evidence is admissible to show what is customarily regarded as a car-load of the particular commodity.[23] Rules applicable to the weight and sufficiency of evidence generally [24] apply in actions arising out of sales in respect to the quantity included in the contract.[25]

(IV) Questions For Jury. Where the language used to designate the quantity is uncertain the construction thereof is for the jury,[26] and when the quantity to be delivered is known the question whether the proper quantity has been delivered is for the jury.[27]

g. Waiver of Objections as to Quantity. Objections to the quantity are waived when the buyer selects and invoices the goods himself,[28] or objects to the delivery wholly on other grounds with knowledge of the difference in quantity;[29] but there will be no waiver if the buyer was ignorant of the deficiency.[30] So too objections based on the quantity delivered are waived if the buyer accepts the goods delivered with knowledge that the quantity is not as stipulated,[31] or if he fails to ascertain the fact, opportunity therefor being given.[32] Acceptance of a

See also Strongitharm v. North Lonsdale Iron, etc., Co., 21 T. L. R. 357; Kimball v. Deere, 108 Iowa 676, 77 N. W. 1041, holding that under a contract for the purchase of certain manufactured articles, providing that such articles should be made "from the patterns" of a certain company manufacturing such goods, and that "no change from said patterns" should be made without the consent of the purchaser, the manufacturer was not required to use the identical patterns which had been used by the company referred to, but only to furnish articles in which there was no change, as to the several parts thereof from the finished product of such company.

Quality of compounded articles.—Where an order for two articles mixed is given to a manufacturer of such a mixture, without specifying the proportion of each article, the manufacturer is empowered to compound the same in the usual manner in which the mixture is prepared for the market. Konitzky v. Meyer, 49 N. Y. 571.

Quality determined by prior sales.— Where the contract recited that goods to be manufactured should be "same as last" made for the purchaser, the contract only bound the seller to furnish goods of the quality of the lot last furnished, and did not oblige it to furnish goods that were perfect. Koch v. Bamford Bros. Silk Mfg. Co., 69 N. J. L.

and such as are merchantable.[39] The mere fact that the value of the goods is not equal to the price paid is immaterial;[40] but if the purchaser inquires the price of goods of the best quality, and, on being given quotations which did not specify the quality, orders the goods, the sale is of the best quality of that class of goods,[41] and an agreement for the best quality is not complied with by furnishing goods of an average quality[42] A sale of goods "with all faults" covers such defects in quality as are not inconsistent with the identity of the goods as described.[43]

(II) LIABILITY FOR DEFECTIVE GOODS.[44] In the absence of fraud on a sale of goods without warranty or particular agreement as to quality, the seller is not answerable for defects,[45] whether obvious or latent,[46] the rule of caveat emptor applying in all its force.[47] Where the sale is by the manufacturer of the goods, however, the rule is in some jurisdictions more strict and he is held liable for defects.[48] But in either case there can be no recovery for superior quality.[49]

b. When Quality Is Designated [50] — (i) In General. If there is a specific agreement as to quality no additional condition will be implied,[51] or read into the contract by construction.[52] So where the quality of the goods is designated in general terms a delivery of goods within that description is sufficient and the buyer has no right to demand goods of a particular make.[53] But if goods of a particular quality are contracted for, it is not sufficient that the goods delivered are merchantable.[54] The agreement as to quality must be substantially complied with,[55] and if there is a failure of such compliance as to a material part of the

L. 331. One who contracts to sell and deliver on board cars barreled spirits, knowing that such goods are to be exported, by implication agrees that the required to furnish goods of any quality except that specified.[58] Unless qualified by conditions indicating that a different meaning was intended,[59] the designation of quality will be construed as it is generally understood among dealers in goods forming the subject-matter of the contract.[60]

(II) BRAND. If the article sold is designated by a particular brand the buyer is not bound to receive an article of any other quality; [61] and on the other hand the obligation of the seller is fulfilled if he delivers the goods known by that brand, although they are not in fact of good quality.[62]

(III) "GOOD" OR "SOUND" GOODS. A designation of the article as "good" or "sound" means that it shall be of medium quality,[63] according to the custom barrels shall be properly filled and suitable for such transportation, and is liable for leakage caused by defects, although they were latent defects in the wood of which such barrels are made. Stevens v. Pincoffs, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 479, 14 Cinc. L. Bul. 110.

Choice quality.— An allegation of a tender of hops of an average of the best product of a crop produced upon certain premises, and that defendants exerted their utmost to produce a crop "of choice quality, in sound condition, of good color, and fully matured," does not show a compliance with a contract to deliver, absolutely, hops of that quality of the trade,[64] and suitable for the purpose for which it is intended.[65] But "good" does not imply any absolute quality but only that the article shall be good of its kind.[66]

(IV) "MERCHANTABLE" GOODS. Similarly where it is provided that the articles sold shall be "merchantable," the articles must be of a quality such as is generally sold in the market[67] and suitable for the purpose for which they are intended,[68] although not of the best quality.[69] If, however, the word "merchantable" has a technical meaning in the locality where the sale is made it will be presumed that the word was used in the technical sense.[70]

(V) "SATISFACTORY" GOODS. Where the contract of sale is to furnish some chattel which shall be satisfactory to the buyer, and the object of the contract is to gratify taste or sensibilities, serve personal convenience, or satisfy individual preference, it is very generally held that the question whether the chattel furnished is satisfactory is for the sole determination of the buyer and that the courts cannot inquire into the reasons for his determination in case he declares that he is not satisfied.[71] So there are some decisions which apparently extend this doctrine to cases where the question is not one of taste but merely of operative fitness or mechanical utility.[72] On the other hand there are decisions that hold that the buyer must show reasons for his dissatisfaction,[73] and that the law will and condition, to be produced upon said premises. Lilienthal v. McCormick, 86 Fed. 100.

say that what in reason ought to satisfy a contracting party does satisfy him.[74] The weight of authority, however, is against both of these views, the rule that has received its sanction being that if the buyer is honestly and in good faith dissatisfied, it is immaterial that he ought in fact to be satisfied and that his dissatisfaction is unreasonable;[75] that the law will not make contracts for people sui juris.[76] It is, however, very distinctly recognized in this line of decisions that the dissatisfaction must be real and in good faith, and not result from caprice or a dishonest design to be dissatisfied in any event.[77] If the contract provides that the thing sold will operate "in a satisfactory manner," it will be construed to mean in a manner satisfactory to a reasonable person and not to the satisfaction of the purchaser however unreasonable he may be.[78]

What is fitness.— Where an order for a book provided for the attachment of a calendar on the outside cover, but did not specify how it was to be placed, the fact that the calendar was placed upside down was no ground for refusal to accept the book, there being nothing to show that plaintiff's contention that that was the proper way to place it, considering the nature and use of the book, was not correct. and the fact that the goods were not to be of the best quality does not change the rule.[80] The buyer is not released, however, because the goods are unfit for the purpose for which they were intended if the quality is specified,[81] or if they were selected by the buyer himself,[82] or manufactured according to his design.[83]

however, goods sold are delivered in instalments, the acceptance of an instalment which does not comply with the requirements of the contract is not a waiver of the seller's right to reject subsequent instalments which also fail to comply with such requirements;[90] but he is not entitled, after such acceptance, to refuse to accept the residue of the goods unless they also fail to comply with the contract,[91] especially where the seller promises to remedy the defects in the goods accepted and that the balance shall conform to the contract.[92]

(VIII) PART OF GOODS DEFECTIVE. If the contract of sale is entire, and part of the goods sold do not fulfil its requirements, the buyer may reject all,[93] if he acts within a reasonable time after discovery that the contract has not been complied with.[94] But on the other hand he cannot accept part of the goods and reject the balance because of their non-compliance with the requirements of the contract.[95] If the contract is severable, the buyer may accept such of the goods as comply with the contract and reject such as do not.[96] In any event the buyer is liable for the price of such part as he accepts.[97]

(IX) EXISTENCE AND CAUSE OF DEFECTS. In order to be available to the buyer the defects must of course exist at the time of the sale.[98] The buyer cannot take advantage of a defect due to the manner of use by him,[99] or to his failure to take proper care of the goods,[1] or where the inefficiency of the article is due to a number of contributing causes of which the defect in the article itself is but one.[2]

c. Sale by Sample [3] — (I) What Constitutes. The mere exhibition of a sample by the seller does not amount to such a designation of quality as to constitute a sale by sample,[4] especially when the quality of the article to be furnished is expressly described in the contract without reference to the sample,[5] or the parties agree that the goods ordered shall differ from the sample in some important particular.[6] To constitute a sale by sample it must appear that the parties contracted solely with reference to the sample, with the understanding that the bulk was like it,[7] and whenever the designation of the quality is by reference to a sample the sale is by sample.[8] As a circumstance tending to show a sale by sample the fact that an examination of the goods in bulk was inconvenient or impossible may be considered.[9] But a sale is not a sale by sample when there is full opportunity afforded to examine the goods in bulk,[10] and it is expressly stated that the sale must be on examination.[11] The sale is not the less one by sample because the purchaser personally took the samples from the bales,[12] or tested the correctness of the sample by taking a second sample.[13]

(II) Rights of Parties. On a sale by sample the obligation rests on the seller to deliver goods corresponding to the sample,[14] and if they do not corre-

Variation from sample.— Under a contract to furnish "a six-ton scale," equal in every respect to another scale which is referred to, it is sufficient to furnish a scale equal in all material respects, for the purpose of weighing six tons, to the one referred to; and it is not necessary to furnish a scale equal to the sample, if the latter has greater strength than is necessary for that purpose. For the purpose of determining whether the goods do conform to the sample the buyer has the right to an inspection and examination of the goods in bulk.[21] The inspection should be made within a reasonable time [22] and at the place of delivery.[23]

Sufficiency of rejection.— Where yarn was sold by sample, and, after receipt of it, defendant made tests to ascertain whether its strength was as great as that of the sample, and, finding that it was not, immediately notified plaintiffs that he held the yarn subject to their order, and requested what disposition should be made thereof, there was a sufficient rejection; the yarn having been shipped directly from the spinner, in England, to defendant, in Illinois, and plaintiffs, the sellers, being located in New York. Hardt v. Western Electric Co., 84 N. Y. App. Div. 249, 82 N. Y. Suppl. 835.

Right to remedy defects.— A trade custom, which imports into a contract for the sale of goods by sample, containing an arbitration clause, a term that the purchaser shall not be entitled to reject the goods on account of variation between the sample and the bulk, provided the variation is such that it can reasonably be remedied by an abatement of the price, and does not affect the purpose for which the goods were purchased, is a good custom. In re Walkers, [1904] 2 K. d. Determination of Quality — (I) IN GENERAL. In the absence of any stipulation to the contrary the quality of the goods is to be determined as of the place of sale.[24] The parties may, however, agree upon a method of determining the quality, and in such case the determination is conclusive.[25] Although the quality cannot, in the absence of an agreement to that effect, be determined by the judgment of one of the parties alone,[26] they may so agree,[27] and if such an agreement is embodied in the contract, the party on whom the authority is conferred must exercise honest judgment and good faith in his decision.[28]

(II) INSPECTION AND APPROVAL — (A) The Right in General. The purchaser has generally the right to an inspection and examination of the goods in order to determine whether they are of the quality contracted for.[29] It is the duty of the seller to afford an opportunity for inspection,[30] and if such opportunity is not afforded or inspection is prevented by the acts of the seller there is no proper delivery in performance of the contract.[31] The buyer may waive his right to inspect by a refusal to accept the goods based on other grounds,[32] or by accepting the goods without asserting his right.[33] But receipt of the goods, will not have such effect if there is no opportunity to examine the goods until after they are received,[34] or if under the terms of the contract inspection is to take place after such receipt.[35]

(B) Agreement For Inspection. Where the contract provides for inspection by a competent inspector "to be agreed upon," the agreement upon an inspector before the inspection is not necessary, but it is sufficient that, before the inspection is complete, the seller agrees to accept as inspector a person chosen by the buyer.[36] Where there is a sufficient agreement for an inspection of the goods such stipulation becomes a condition precedent [37] which must be complied with before there can be a sufficient performance of the contract to bind the purchaser,[38] but the condition being chiefly for the purchaser's benefit may be waived by him.[39]

(C) Place of Inspection. In the absence of any special agreement the place of delivery is generally the place of inspection;[40] but where delivery is made by carrier the place of final destination is usually the place of inspection.[41] The

not,[49] and cannot be impeached except for fraud, bad faith, or failure to exercise honest judgment.[50] But fraud or bad faith or a failure to exercise honest judgment will afford grounds for refusal to be bound by the inspector's determination.[51] If a particular mode of inspection is provided for, that mode should be followed, and no other, or it will not be binding;[52] but in the absence of any stipulation the inspection should be made in the customary manner,[53] that is, in selling contract that the article shall be tested by a particular person in the purchaser's employ is not a condition precedent to be performed by the seller, but merely a mutual agreement that such person may make the test. Hubbard v. Chapman, 34 N. Y. App. Div. 252, 54 N. Y. Suppl. 527 [affirmed in 165 N. Y. 609, 58 N. E. 1088].

Selection of inspector.—Where a contract for the sale of lumber provided: "The inspection of this lumber to be made after the same is landed here (Windsor), by a competent inspector to be agreed upon between buyer and seller," it was not essential for the parties to agree upon an inspector before the inspection was begun; and a person chosen by the buyer having inspected the lumber, and before his work was completed the seller having agreed to accept him as inspector, the contract was satisfied. Thomson v. Matheson, 30 Can. Sup. Ct. 357.

Alternative stipulation.—When a contract for the sale of goods by its terms provides that the property is to be delivered "subject to the inspection of B, or other mutually satisfactory," neither party has the right to demand inspection by any other person, unless B neglects or refuses. The fact that B is one of the sellers makes no difference. Dustan v. McAndrew, 44 N. Y. 72 [affirming 10 Bosw. 130].

chaser refuses to accept the goods as being of a quality inferior to that contracted for, the burden is on the seller to show that the goods are of such quality, in an action for the price of the goods or for damages.[63] After acceptance of the goods the presumption is that they are of the agreed quality,[64] and the burden is on the buyer to show that they were not of the agreed quality.[65] So too in an action by the buyer to recover damages for defects in quality the burden of proof is on the buyer; [66] and where goods were sold as damaged the buyer has the burden of proving that between the sale and delivery they suffered further damage.[67]

(B) Admissibility — (1) IN GENERAL. If the contract is ambiguous as to the quality of the goods sold parol evidence may be resorted to to explain it,[68] but parol evidence is not admissible to show that a sale not purporting to be a sale by sample is in fact such a contract.[69] The quality of the goods delivered may be shown by the declarations and admissions of the parties,[70] by testimony as to the condition of the goods while in transit,[71] or on arrival at destination; [72] but testimony as to the defective condition of the goods some time after their delivery is not generally admissible.[73] Evidence as to the price for which the buyer resold

the goods is also admissible.[74] Evidence that merchants generally would consider the goods to be of a certain quality is not admissible unless founded on proof of a custom.[75] While evidence as to the mere possibility of the existence of circumstances which would affect the quality is not admissible,[76] the actual spurious character of the article may of course be shown.[77] The quality of the article may also be shown by evidence as to its fitness for the purposes for which it was intended,[78] the results of its use,[79] and, in the case of a sale of machinery, by the character of its product.[80]

(2) Inspection and Results Thereof. Testimony as to the quality of goods must as a rule be based on personal knowledge,[81] but, if based on such knowledge, as acquired by examination and observation, it is admissible.[82] Evidence tending to show an inspection and approval by a person agreed on for that purpose is admissible,[83] as is also the evidence of such person as to the results of his inspection.[84] It may, however, be shown that the defects revealed by the inspection trial or test were due to the lack of skill or mismanagement of the buyer.[85] Evidence as to the inspection of other goods of the same kind is not admissible.[86]

(3) Comparison With Other Goods. Evidence is admissible to show the characteristics of goods of the quality contracted for [87] and their value,[88] and this value may be compared with that of the goods actually sold and delivered.[89] It may also be shown that the goods were of a fair average quality of their kind.[90] Evidence comparing the goods sold with other similar goods sold at or about the same time to other persons, although considered admissible in some jurisdictions,[91] is rejected in others,[92] and a similar difference of opinion exists as to evidence tending to show that other machines of the same kind worked well elsewhere.[93] So too it has been held that the buyer may show the worthlessness of other similar goods bought from the same seller,[94] and, for the purpose of proving that the goods delivered were not as ordered, may compare them with samples from other merchants.[95] Where a machine was rejected as defective, evidence as to a comparison between the work of such machine and a good machine subsequently purchased is admissible as showing that the first was defective,[96] but no comparison with other kinds of machines doing similar work is admissible.[97]

(c) Weight and Sufficiency.[98] Proof as to quality must as a rule be affirmative,[99] and evidence that the goods were well manufactured of the best material cannot prevail against positive and uncontradicted testimony that they were found defective as soon as put in use.[1] But where it is shown that the design furnished by the buyer, in accordance with which the goods were made, was defective proof of perfect material and construction may be sufficient.[2] Ordinarily in the absence of anything to show that defects were caused by conditions existing during carriage of the goods evidence that they were in good condition when shipped is insufficient to overcome evidence of defects when delivered;[3] but when the goods were transported during a season of wet weather the fact that the goods arrived at their destination damaged by wet weather does not show that they were damaged when shipped.[4] On the other hand, proof that a machine was running in good order and without repairs two years after delivery is sufficient to show that it was of good quality.[5]

Proof of adulteration.—On an issue as to whether a quantity of tallow sold to plaintiff by defendant was adulterated, it appeared that two barrels, when melted, were found to contain thirty per cent of marble dust. On this discovery the remaining eighty-three barrels were inspected, and, after taking a thin skimming off the top, each barrel was found to contain a gritty matter throughout. The eighty-three barrels were used in connection with other tallow, and the kettles in which they were melted contained a large quantity of a substance similar to that deposited on melting the first two barrels. It appeared that, at about the time of the sale, defendant had at its works a quantity of marble, and there was no evidence that defendant had any use for marble dust, unless for purposes of adulteration. The evidence was sufficient to enable the jury to find that the eighty-three barrels of tallow were adulterated, and to estimate the amount of adulteration in the entire quantity of tallow. Comparison with other goods.—There is no evidence to sustain a defense, in an action for the price of yarn sold, that the yarn was unsound and unmerchantable, when it is simply shown that other yarn than that in suit, purchased from plaintiff by defendant, was defective, and it is uncertain whether the defect was inherent in the yarn at the time of its delivery. (IV) QUESTIONS FOR JURY. Where there is any uncertainty in the description of the quality of the goods, the construction is for the jury.[6] It is also for the jury to determine what constitutes a defect,[7] and whether a defect actually exists.[8]

e. Liability For Injuries Due to Defects.[9] A seller of defective articles is liable for injuries to persons or property caused by such defects in a direct action for the injury,[10] or the buyer may plead the injury in an action for the price.[11] The rule has been applied in a case of a sale of unwholesome provisions,[12] hay,[13] drugs of a kind not ordered,[14] defective boiler,[15] defective firearms,[16] gun cartridges,[17] impure oils,[18] and diseased animals.[19] But in the absence of defect the seller is not liable because of the intrinsically dangerous nature of the article.[20]

f. Sales on Trial or Approval — (1) IN GENERAL. The contract of sale may provide for a trial or test to determine whether the goods are satisfactory and that the buyer may return the goods if after such trial they prove to be unsatisfactory.[21] Under a contract of this character the obligation of both parties is

Faulty design.—A furniture dealer who sold a folding bed, manufactured by others, without warranty, which proved to be dangerous to persons using it, not from defective parts, but from inherent defects, resulting from faulty design, which neither he nor the purchaser could discover unless skilled in mechanics, was not liable for injuries resulting from the defects, where the sale was made upon inspection, and the terms thereof were put in writing. Construction of contract.—A contract for suspended until the purchaser's satisfaction is gained or waived.[22] The buyer is not bound to accept until after trial is made,[23] and if the goods are unsatisfactory he may return them and his reasons therefor cannot be questioned [24] so long as his determination is made in good faith.[25] In some jurisdictions sales on trial are, according to the wording of the stipulation, differentiated into those which provide absolutely for a trial and those which do not. Thus it has been held in New York that if the contract provides that the machine sold should be kept if it worked well, the buyer was bound to give it a fair trial; but if it provided merely that it should be kept if it suited the buyer he was not bound to give it a trial before rejecting it.[26] Sales on trial are in the nature of bailments,[27] under which the buyer is, pending the trial, not liable for loss of or injury to the goods unless he is guilty of negligence.[28]

(II) Mode of Trial. When the sale is dependent on trial or test, the vendee must properly apply the article sold to the use for which it was purchased if he would claim that when applied it did not serve,[29] and it should be properly and fairly tested.[30] On a sale of machinery it may be the duty of the seller under the sale of machinery to be set up "ready to run" by the seller, which provided that one fourth of the price should be paid when the machinery was delivered, one fourth ten days after the successful operation of the same, and the remainder ninety days after the successful operation of the same, cannot be construed to require the machinery to stand a test of ten days' successful operation before the second payment became due, and of ninety days before the final payment should be due. the contract to set up the machine and conduct or assist in making the test;[31] but the fact that the buyer himself set it up does not affect his rights, if his act did not interfere with the trial.[32] The question for determination is not whether the machine sold can be made to work in a manner satisfactory to the seller when operated by his skilled employees, but whether it can be made so to work by the employees of the buyer,[33] and it is no objection that the buyer's employees were inexperienced.[34] The most that is demanded of the buyer is that he bring to trial honesty of purpose according to his capacity, and he is not bound to exercise even the skill of ordinary persons.[35] If a certain period is fixed for making the trial the buyer has the full period in which to make the test;[36] but he is not bound to let the trial continue for the full period and may stop it whenever he is convinced that the article is unsatisfactory.[37] In the absence of any special agreement the trial should be made within a reasonable time.[38]

(III) APPROVAL AND ACCEPTANCE. On the fulfilment of the condition and acceptance of the goods sold on trial the sale becomes complete and the buyer is liable for the price,[39] and the same result will follow if he waives a complete test and accepts the articles.[40] The failure of the buyer to exercise the option

Failure of the buyer to make the trial provided for is equivalent to an approval and acceptance. McDonald v. Pierson, 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 128; Waters Heater Co. v. Mansfield, 48 Vt. 378; Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Brush-Swan Electric Light, etc., Co., 31 Fed. 535.

Trial prevented by buyer.— If the trial provided for in the contract is prevented by the buyer, he waives such stipulation. Smith v. Barber, 153 Ind. 322, 53 N. E. 1014.

Excuse for failure to make test.—The opinion of experts that a machine sold on trial will not work up to the stipulation in the contract is no excuse for the failure to make the required test. McDonald v. Pierson, 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 128. So it has been held that a failure to make the test required is not excused by the fact that a similar article within a reasonable time, the article being retained, is equivalent to an acceptance,[41] and the mere fact that the buyer complained to the seller of the unsatisfactory character of the goods is not sufficient to change the effect of his conduct.[42] So too it amounts to an acceptance if the buyer so misuses the property as to materially impair its value.[43] But it does not amount to an acceptance that the buyer retained the article at the request of the seller,[44] or retained and used it on the failure of the seller to remove it after due notice so to do.[45]

(IV) EXERCISE OF RIGHT TO REJECT OR RETURN — (A) In General. Where the contract provides for a return of the goods if not satisfactory, the buyer cannot relieve himself from liability for the price, unless he returns or offers to return them,[46] and the offer to return must be unconditional.[47] But the buyer is relieved from the obligation to return if he is informed that the seller will not receive the article,[48] or if on an offer to return the seller fails to give shipping directions.[49] The seller may recover damages if the buyer wrongfully detains the article,[50] or if, the article being returned, it has been so injured while in the buyer's possession as to materially impair its value.[51] If the right of return is properly exercised the buyer is of course relieved of liability.[52]

(B) Notice.[53] If no return is stipulated for, there need be neither a return nor an offer to return, notice of the rejection being sufficient.[54] The contract bought from the seller by another person had been tested and rejected. Waters Heater Co. v. Mansfield, 48 Vt. 378. But see Waters' Patent Heater Co. v. Smith, 120 Mass. 444, holding that, if it had been ascertained by actual trial that machines exactly similar were necessarily incapable from their construction of doing what was promised for them, it was not necessary to put the particular one to the test of actual experiment.

may provide that notice of defects shall be given to the seller, and in such case the notice stipulated for must be given to relieve the buyer from liability for the price.[55] Such notice may, however, be waived,[56] as where the seller agrees to make inquiry as to the result himself.[57]

(c) Time and Place For Return or Rejection. If the contract limits the time within which the trial is to be made and the article accepted, the option to reject and return must be exercised promptly on or before the expiration of the period limited,[58] and he cannot elect to reject and return the property after the period limited has expired.[59] Any unnecessary application of the article to his advantage and benefit is consistent only with a decision to become or continue owner;[60] at least unless the continued use is necessary to obviate serious inconvenience resulting from the making of the trial.[61] In the absence of any limitation as to time, the option to reject must be exercised and notice thereof given within a reasonable time.[62] What is a reasonable time depends on the circumstances.[63]

What is reasonable time illustrated.— Where a cotton gin was taken upon trial, in the spring of the year, with an agreement

If no place of return is designated, the buyer's place of residence or business is the place of return.[64]

(v) RIGHT TO REPAIR OR REPLACE. A stipulation that if the machine sold proves defective on a trial of a designated period the seller shall repair the defect applies only to defects discovered within the period.[65] If the contract gives the seller the privilege of replacing the machine, the buyer's right of rejection is not absolute, but the seller may insist on his right to substitute a new machine.[66] If the seller fails to exercise his option to repair or replace within a reasonable time the buyer may then reject the machine.[67]

g. Estoppel and Waiver as to Defects in Quality[68] — (i) IN GENERAL. The buyer is estopped to complain of defects in the goods when he had knowledge or notice thereof at the time of the sale,[69] or retains the goods after a reasonable time in which to make inspection has elapsed,[70] or when he selects the article himself,[71] or directs how it shall be constructed.[72] So too if he refuses to accept the goods on other grounds he cannot afterward object on the ground that they are defective.[73] to purchase, if it answered its purpose, and notice was sent, in October following, that it would not perform, and that he would not keep it, the buyer made his election seasonably. Hall v. Merriwether, 19 Tex. 224.

(ii) ACCEPTANCE OF GOODS.[74] In the absence of fraud or breach of war-

Extent of buyer's knowledge.— The vendee's knowledge that the slave was diseased will not defeat his redhibitory action. Knowledge to be clearly shown.— The knowledge of the existence of a disease in a slave, by the buyer, which would deprive him of his action to rescind the sale for a redhibitory vice, must be clearly established. Defect not discoverable on inspection.—A seller's obligation as to the quality of oil delivered survived acceptance by an inspector, if a defect therein was latent, and was such as would not appear upon an inspection to ascertain whether the oil accepted corresponded with that described in the contract. Carleton v. Lombard, 149 N. Y. 137, 43 N. E. 422. See also Brown v. Sayles, 27 Vt. 227.

Partial inspection.— Where partial failure of consideration is alleged in defense to an action on notes given for the price of property, a charge is erroneous where it directs a deduction for the deficiencies if plaintiff prevented a full and satisfactory examination, as defendant's knowledge of facts acquired by partial investigation would not be obliterated by any hindrance to further inspection interposed by plaintiff. Merrill v. Taylor, 72 Tex. 293, 10 S. W. 532.

Time and place of inspection.— Where a contract of sale of lumber provided for grading the same according to certain rules, without saying by whom it should be graded, and during the whole period of dealings it was graded by the purchaser after reaching its destination, and accounts rendered monthly to the seller, who made no objection, it was error to instruct the jury that must, however, be unconditional,[84] with knowledge of the defect,[85] and must not have been induced by fraud or misrepresentation,[86] or by stress of circumstances making such acceptance necessary.[87] On the other hand a refusal to accept must also be unqualified and certain,[88] and mere complaint or protest is not sufficient.[89] So a failure to reject or return goods within a reasonable time will be construed as an acceptance waiving defects.[90]

(III) ACCEPTANCE OF PART OF GOODS. The acceptance of a part of the goods, while waiving defects as to the part accepted,[91] does not waive defects as to the remainder,[92] unless the contract is entire.[93] The buyer cannot of course refuse the remainder if it is of the proper quality.[94]

b. Circumstances Within the Control of Seller. If the default or delay is due to circumstances or causes within the control of the seller, he is not excused. Thus the non-performance is not excused if it is due to the failure of the seller to keep on hand a sufficient supply of the goods sold,[99] or if he has by his own acts put it out of his power to perform.[1] So a failure to deliver goods of the proper quality is not excused because of mistake in sending goods of the wrong kind,[2] or because the wrong delivery was due to the fraud of the seller's employee.[3]

c. Impossibility of Performance — (i) In General. The general rule that no impossibility arising subsequent to the making of the contract will excuse the performance thereof [4] is of course applicable to the contract of sale;[5] and a seller who promises unconditionally to deliver takes the risk of being unable to perform, although his inability is caused by inevitable accident, or circumstances beyond his control.[6] There is, however, a distinction between cases where the contract is to do something impossible of performance and those where the contract is to do something possible in itself but performance of which is prevented by the occurrence of inevitable accident, although not foreseen by the party and not within his control.[7]

(ii) Inability to Obtain Goods. Where the contract of sale is unconditional it is no excuse for non-delivery that the seller's factory or the one on which he relied to obtain the goods has been destroyed or forced to close through natural causes,[8] or that the goods cannot be obtained in the market.[9] The seller is regarded as an insurer to the extent of making good the loss.[10] So where the real ground for failure to deliver is inability to furnish the goods, and there were constant demands by the buyer for delivery, the non-delivery cannot be justified on the ground that the buyer failed to give the notice required by the contract.[11]

(III) Performance Difficult or Burdensome. Default or delay is not excused because performance has become difficult, dangerous, or burdensome.[12] Thus it is no excuse that delivery is dangerous because of the existence of war,[13] or because a pestilence prevails,[14] or that it is difficult because of the inclemency of the weather.[15] It will not excuse delivery that, because of new laws or regulations enacted after the making of the contract, additional burdens will be imposed on the seller.[16]

(IV) Deficiency in Facilities For Transportation — (A) Route of Transportation. In accordance with the general rule it has usually been held that the seller is not excused from delivery by the obstruction of routes of transportation, whether due to the freezing of waterways,[17] seizure of a railway by the government,[18] freshets,[19] or other causes,[20] unless such contingencies are expressly provided for in the contract,[21] and especially will the rule prevail where other routes of transportation were open to the seller.[22]

(B) Means of Transportation. A failure to deliver under the terms of the contract is not excused by the inability of the seller to procure cars,[23] or other means of transportation,[24] unless there is a stipulation covering such contingency,[25] and even in such case he must show that he made a reasonable effort to procure transportation.[26]

(c) Delay in Transportation. Generally the seller is excused for delay in delivery when such delay is due to delays in transportation over which the seller had no control,[27] especially where the contract of sale contains a stipulation to that effect.[28]

(v) Loss or Destruction of Property. Where the sale is of specified goods which, without the seller's fault, are lost or destroyed before the day of delivery, the seller is excused from delivery and the buyer from obligation to pay.[29] In such cases a condition is implied in the contract, the effect of which is to relieve the seller from the obligation to perform.[30] The principle when applied to the sale of crops to be produced may, however, be modified by circumstances. Thus, while the seller will be excused by the loss of the crop, by natural causes, if the sale is of a specific crop to be grown on specific land,[31] or if the nature of the crop is such that ordinary market stock cannot be substituted for it,[32] he will not be excused if the crop is not specific or to be grown on particular land,[33] and the article can be procured elsewhere.[34]

Consequential damages.— Pending the passage of the Wilson tariff bill of 1894, defendant filled an order for lard at Chicago to be shipped to plaintiffs in Cuba, the goods to be delivered to the purchasers at the point of shipment, but delay, for which defendants were in no way responsible, occurred in forwarding a part of it by vessel from New Orleans, and before it reached Havana plaintiffs had to pay duties imposed thereon by the Spanish government in retaliation for the passage of the Wilson bill, and which, but for the delay, would not have been collected. (vi) Impossibility Created by Law. The seller is excused from performance where it is rendered impossible by reason of some action taken by or under authority of law.[35] It is, however, no excuse that, because of a change in the law, the performance has been rendered more expensive or burdensome.[36]

d. Stipulations Excusing Default or Delay — (i) In General. The contract of sale may provide that in certain contingencies a failure to deliver shall be excused. A common form of stipulation is that the seller shall be excused if delivery is prevented "by strikes, accidents or other causes beyond the control" of the seller, and when embodied in the contract is binding on the buyer,[37] and when such a stipulation exists it will exclude other excuses.[38] To excuse the seller under such stipulation the failure to deliver must have been caused by a contingency falling naturally within its provisions.[39] But the exception of "other causes" in such a stipulation will include a failure to deliver due to an inability to procure cars for the transportation of the goods.[40] It is, however, incumbent on the seller to make at least a reasonable effort to perform, and if he does not the stipulation will not protect him.[41] So too the merely temporary existence of

Defense insufficient.— It is no answer to an action against the vendor of goods to be shipped at St. Petersburg on a particular day, in certain ships, that such goods were seized by the Russian government on board lighters for the purpose of loading the ships, and that the ships cut their cables and put to sea to avoid an embargo. Ct. 882, 30 L. ed. 920); a failure to deliver due to mere difficulty in procuring labor if it could have been obtained by a reasonable effort at prices not prohibitive (Thomas Iron Co. v. Jackson Iron Co., 131 Mich. 130, 91 N. W. 137); a failure to deliver due to pro rating with other customers of the seller (Indian Mountain Jellico Coal Co. v. Asheville Ice, etc., Co., 134 N. C. 574, 47 S. E. 116); or a failure due to differences between the parties as to the manner of delivery, although material and labor were scarce (Union Trust Co. v. Webber-Seely Hardware Co., 73 Ark. 584, 84 S. "Shortage of cars" construed.— Where a contract for a sale of coal from a designated mine provides that "if there should be a shortage of cars, shipment will be divided from time to time in fair proportion on all orders," the "shortage of cars" means a shortage at the mine. What is reasonable effort to perform.— Where, in an action for non-delivery of coal under a contract to ship five thousand tons in the course of nine months, "but, if prevented or obstructed by breaches or other unavoidable occurrences on the railroads or at the mines, no claim for damages will be allowed," such breaches were proved, it was correct to instruct the jury that defendant was not bound to deliver to plaintiffs the whole amount of their order to the exclusion of other customers, but that his obligation would be satisfied by the delivery to them of such a proportion of his reduced means of supply as the amount of plaintiffs' order the contingency will not excuse the seller if he is able to deliver after the contingency has ceased to exist.[42]

(II) STRIKE CLAUSE. The effect of a clause excusing a failure to deliver due to strikes depends on the wording of the stipulation. A stipulation excusing delivery when prevented by strikes refers to such strikes as might be the proximate cause of preventing the seller from handling the product of its plant, not such as, indirectly and remotely acting in conjunction with other and independent and efficient causes, might affect the seller's business and cause the handling of his product to be attended with inconvenience and difficulty.[43] If, however, the clause refers to general strikes, the seller is not excused unless the strike is general.[44] If the sale is made subject to strikes, accidents, or causes beyond the seller's control, the seller is not liable for deficiencies on his part in shipments due to a strike or a shortage of cars or other causes beyond his control, if he treats the buyer fairly and ratably with reference to other parties with whom he was dealing, and is not required to deliver to the buyer the whole amount of his order to the exclusion of other customers.[45] If the sale is subject to strikes beyond the control of the seller, the strike must be so far beyond his control as to render bore to the whole amount of defendant's sales, including the ordinary amount of his home trade. Oakman v. Boyce, 106 Mass. 477.

Ability to procure goods.— Where a contract for the sale by defendant to plaintiff of a designated number of cases of canned tomatoes contained a stipulation that if by the destruction of defendant's cannery by fire, or if on account of strikes, or from any other cause over which he had no control, he was prevented from performing the contract, he should not be liable for any damages for such failure, the contract did not restrict defendant from procuring the tomatoes to fill the contract from his own or neighborhood fields, and therefore, in case of the destruction of the tomato crop in such field by frost, he was required to make necessary efforts to procure the necessary material elsewhere. Newell v. New Holstein Canning Co., 119 Wis. 635, 97 N. W. 487. A contract whereby plaintiff agreed to deliver to defendant such oil as it should need for a certain period, and providing that plaintiff should not be liable for damages from failure to supply oil when due to the act of God or unavoidable accidents, the complete exhaustion of the oil wells in the vicinity, or the revocation of certain leases by the lessors, and further providing that, except where plaintiff should be "unable for the last aforesaid causes to deliver the oil which may be demanded of him under this contract," he should during the term be required to supply defendant all the crude oil which it should require, did not contemplate the release of plaintiff from the obligation to supply oil on the revocation of the leases therein mentioned, if, after such revocation, there should be oil enough produced from other wells in the vicinity with which to supply defendant under the contract. 44. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Block, etc., Smelting Co., 36 Ill. App. 38.

Construction of stipulation.— Where a "strike clause" in a contract for the delivery of coal in Pittsburg only provides for the contingencies of "a general strike or shutdown in the Pittsburg district," the penalties, provisions, or conditions therein provided for will not be enforced and applied to a condition of general suspension of coal mining, enforced by intimidation and violence, that reached to transportation and mining and everything connected with a supply of coal throughout all districts from which a supply could he drawn for Pittsburg. 45. Garfield, etc., Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal, etc., Co., 199 Mass. 22, 84 N. E. 1020, holding, however, that the seller could not offer such causes as excuse for his failure to keep his contract with the buyer proportionally with other parties with whom he had contracted, where he could have done so without discriminating against those entitled under his contracts, and where, after the exigency upon which he relied to excuse his non-performance had arisen, he made new contracts with others for the sale of coal, which he fulfilled.

performance impossible.[46] If the clause provides that the seller will use every effort to fulfil the contract, but that he will not be liable for damages for non-fulfilment if his business is so interrupted by strikes as to materially decrease production in his plant, a strike causing such decrease will relieve him from liability for damages, although the strike was caused by a reduction of wages.[47] A seizure by the carrier of coal en route to the buyer is within the clause, there being a scarcity of coal because of a strike in the mines.[48] Where the contract provides that deliveries shall be subject to strikes, the existence of a strike merely suspends deliveries during the strike and does not terminate the contract,[49] and the seller is therefore bound to resume deliveries within a reasonable time after the strike has ceased.[50]

e. Circumstances Within Control of Buyer — (I) IN GENERAL. The failure of the seller to perform is excused when performance is prevented by the acts and conduct of the buyer,[51] as for example by acts or conduct preventing the seller from obtaining the goods to fulfil his contract,[52] by acts and conduct indicating an intent to abandon the contract and refuse performance thereof,[53] or by the failure of the buyer to perform conditions imposed on him by the contract,[54] as for instance conditions affecting the use of the goods.[55] So too the seller is excused if the goods are to be used for the purpose of defrauding others.[56]

so will excuse the seller's failure to deliver.[57] So it has been held in some jurisdictions that if the buyer of grain agrees to furnish sacks therefor, his failure will excuse the seller from delivery;[58] but in others the failure of the buyer to furnish the facilities for packing has been regarded as excusing the seller only from packing as agreed and not from making delivery.[59] If goods are to be delivered on cars the failure of the buyer to furnish a place of storage while being loaded is no excuse for non-delivery.[60]

(B) Means of Transportation. Where by the terms of the contract it is the duty of the buyer to furnish cars or other means of transportation [61] his failure so to do will excuse the failure of the seller to deliver; [62] but of course the performance of the obligation thus imposed on the buyer may itself be prevented by the acts of the seller, in which case the failure of the buyer affords no excuse.[63] So too if the seller absolutely refuses to deliver, he cannot afterward excuse himself on the ground of the buyer's failure to furnish cars.[64]

(III) FAILURE TO GIVE INSTRUCTIONS AS TO DELIVERIES. Non-performance by the seller is excused if the buyer, when obligated so to do by the contract, fails to order deliveries; [65] or to give instructions as to the size, quality, or quantity of the articles desired; [66] or to give proper shipping directions.[67]

Designation of place.— Where a contract provides that goods are to be delivered at any place on the banks of a river between points stipulated, and that the purchaser may designate the place of delivery between such points, it is no defense to the seller, in an action upon the contract for non-delivery, that no place was designated by the purchasers, as it was the duty of the seller to make delivery at any convenient point which he might select between the places designated in the contract. Hartfield v. Patton, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,158*a*, Hempst. 268.

Delay at request of buyer.— Although shipping directions are given, the seller may still recover where, at the subsequent request of the buyer, made before the time named for shipment, shipment is indefinitely delayed, and no other instructions are given. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Diamond State Iron Co., 126 Ill. 294, 18 N. E. 735.

Sufficiency of shipping directions.— Where plaintiffs contracted with S for a quantity of steel blooms, to be shipped as per a freight contract in the hands of S, accepted by plaintiffs; and also bought blooms from M, who had a contract for them with S, subsequently selling the blooms under both contracts to defendant, plaintiffs were liable to defendant for the failure of S to deliver the blooms according to both contracts, although they were not notified of the shipping directions given under the contract with M. Dwight v. Eckert, 117 Pa. St. 490, 12 Atl. 32.

Waiver.— The giving of shipping directions is waived if the seller puts it out of his power to deliver as by a voluntary assignment. Woolner v. Hill, 93 N. Y. 576.

(iv) Extension of Time. Delay in making delivery is excused if at the request or with the assent of the buyer the time is extended.[68]

(v) Refusal to Accept. The failure of the seller to make delivery is excused when the buyer has requested him to discontinue deliveries,[69] or has refused to accept deliveries tendered,[70] and the fact that the rejection of the goods was in good faith does not affect the result.[71] While the failure of the buyer to be present at the time and place of performance to receive the goods will ordinarily excuse a failure on the part of the seller to deliver,[72] such will not be the

What constitutes refusal.— The fact that the consignee, by agreement with the carrier, the latter being protected by a bond, was allowed to take freight in advance of presentation of the bill of lading, did not make it incumbent on him to obtain possession of a consignment, where the agreement with the consignor was that the bill should be delivered on payment of the purchase-price, and the consignor negligently detained the bill. Ramish v. Kirschbraun, 107 Cal. 659, 40 Pac. 1045. Where a purchaser of goods, to be manufactured for him, before delivery, wrote the seller that the purchaser would not need the goods for some time, but that, if some of them were on hand, the purchaser would take them, although he would prefer not to do so, the letter could not be construed as a refusal to accept. contracts which are also known as contracts of sale or return, namely, when the seller delivers the goods under an agreement by the buyer to return the goods or pay the price.[86] In these classes of contracts the property passes to the buyer by delivery subject only to be defeated by the performance of the condition subsequent.[87] Consequently if by the terms of the contract payment of the price is made a condition precedent to the passing of the property the contract is not one of sale or return.[88]

b. Time and Place For Return. If no particular time is fixed for the return of the goods they must be returned in a reasonable time,[89] but if a particular time is fixed the return must be made within that time.[90] If no place is designated for the return it is incumbent on the buyer to seek the seller.[91]

c. Effect of Failure to Return. On a failure to return within the time limited or, if no time is fixed, within a reasonable time, the sale becomes absolute and the buyer is liable for the price,[92] and no demand is necessary to fix his liability.[93] The loss or destruction of the property is no excuse for the failure to return as, the title being in him, the buyer is liable for the loss.[94] If, however, the seller denies the right of the buyer to return the goods, the latter is not liable if they are lost or destroyed.[95]

13. Sales to Arrive — a. In General. The sale may be conditioned "on arrival" of the goods, or of goods "to arrive," these phrases meaning the same thing.[96] Generally such contracts are conditional on the arrival of the goods, not of the vessel, and, if no goods arrive, the contract is at an end, relieving the seller of his obligation to deliver.[97] The contract may, however, be conditioned on the safe arrival of the vessel, and in such case the seller is bound, although no goods arrive, as the contract is absolute to deliver if the vessel arrives, although the goods are not on board.[98] A sale of goods to arrive by a particular date does not import that the goods must arrive on the day, but merely that the seller is bound to deliver and the buyers to accept only goods that have arrived by that day, and if no goods arrive the contract is at an end.[99]

b. Particular Vessel. If the contract is for the sale of goods to arrive by a particular ship, the arrival of the goods in that ship is a condition precedent, and if, in transit, they are transferred to another ship and arrive in that ship, the seller is not bound to deliver, although the ship originally named also arrived.[1] If there is a stipulation that the seller shall give the buyer notice of the name of the vessel as soon as known to him strict compliance with such stipulation is a condition precedent,[2] but a slight error in the name of the vessel will not justify a refusal of the goods.[3]

c. Goods Not Consigned to Seller. Ordinarily the condition in a sale to arrive by a particular vessel is not fulfilled, so as to make the seller answerable for non-delivery, by the arrival of goods of the proper description but not consigned to the seller, and with which he did not intend to deal.[4] But if the goods arriving are the same that the seller expected to sell, in the belief that they were consigned to him, he is answerable for non-delivery, although they were not in fact so consigned.[5]

d. Quantity and Quality of Goods. On a sale of a certain quantity to arrive, if the quantity stipulated does not arrive the buyer is not bound to accept, and conversely the seller is not bound to deliver,[6] but the rule is otherwise if there is no specific agreement as to quantity.[7] So too the goods arriving must generally be of the quality agreed on,[8] although if there is an express warranty the buyer may accept the goods and sue for the breach.[9]

C. Acceptance — 1. Obligation to Accept and Remove Goods — a. In General. While the obligation to deliver implies a reciprocal obligation to accept,[10] yet as delivery and acceptance are concurrent conditions the duty to accept does not arise unless there is a sufficient delivery,[11] or offer to deliver.[12] Therefore the buyer is not bound to accept unless the delivery is made at the proper place [13] and time,[14] or if the delivery is not of the proper quantity,[15] or the goods not of the proper quality,[16] or if the goods are not shipped from the place designated in the contract.[17] He is not bound to accept without an opportunity to inspect the goods.[18] On the other hand if the delivery or offer to deliver is good the buyer is bound to accept,[19] and a proper delivery is sufficient to bind the buyer, although he refuses to accept.[20] If the contract is such that the seller is not bound to send the goods and he places them at the disposal of the buyer, affording him reasonable facilities to remove them,[21] the buyer is bound to accept and remove them.[22]

b. Time of Acceptance and Removal. The buyer is not bound to accept the goods on the day of their arrival if that is not the day of delivery.[23] If no definite time for acceptance is fixed, ordinarily acceptance may and should be within a reasonable time,[24] although it may be the duty of the buyer to accept the goods at once if time is of the essence of the contract,[25] or the goods are in danger of loss.[26]

If the time of delivery is limited to a certain period, within which delivery is to be made at the buyer's option, he is at least obliged to accept the goods at the end of the period.[27] If the goods are to be removed by the buyer, and no time is fixed, he may and must remove them within a reasonable time.[28] Failure to accept and remove within the time specified is waived by subsequent deliveries.[29]

c. Refusal or Failure to Accept or Remove. Where delivery is made of goods under a valid contract and conforming to the contract, at the place and in the manner agreed on, the buyer's failure or refusal to accept does not relieve him from liability for the price.[30] The seller may on the buyer's refusal to accept resell the goods and recover the difference in price.[31] Mere delay in removing the goods does not forfeit the buyer's right to the property,[32] but merely renders him liable for damages which the seller sustains thereby,[33] expense of storage,[34] and demurrage.[35]

d. Excuses For Failure to Accept or Remove. The failure of the buyer to accept and remove the goods is excused when the seller in making delivery has failed to comply with the conditions of the contract,[36] unless they are of an immaterial character,[37] such as drawing on the buyer for the price before delivery,[38] and this is especially true when the mistake is corrected as soon as called to the seller's attention.[39] If, however, the seller persists in his claim to impose other conditions than those named in the contract the buyer will be absolved from his obligation.[40] The buyer is of course not excused from acceptance because circumstances arise which render the goods unavailable for the use contemplated at the time of the sale,[41] or because their use would no longer be profitable.[42]

2. Acts Constituting Acceptance — a. In General. Acceptance may precede as well as follow delivery,[43] and in such case may be by express words.[44] Acceptance of goods in performance of the contract of sale both comprehends physical receipt and mental assent.[45] To constitute an acceptance of goods something more than words is necessary.[46] And the mere receipt of goods is insufficient to show an acceptance,[47] especially where the buyer has the right of inspection;[48] but there must be some act on the part of the buyer indicating an intent to receive the goods in performance of the contract and to retain and exercise dominion over them.[49] The acceptance may be by a third person acting as the buyer's agent,[50] or by one who has repurchased from the buyer.[51]

b. Acts of Ownership — (1) In General. An acceptance may be indicated by the exercise of acts of ownership,[52] as by branding cattle,[53] mortgaging the property,[54] requesting the seller to retain possession for the buyer,[55] or taking an inventory and acceptance of keys to a building where the property is stored.[56] But where the purchaser orders goods of a certain class, and the seller ships a part of the goods ordered and also other goods not ordered, the purchaser may pay for the goods ordered without making himself liable for the price of the other

(II) RETENTION AND USE. Generally acceptance will be implied if the buyer retains and uses the goods as his own,[58] and the mere fact that he complained of defects in the goods will not affect this result.[59] The effect of the use of the article may, however, be modified by the circumstances surrounding such use,[60] as where the use is for the purpose of trial,[61] especially when the seller represents that the machine on trial can and will be made to work properly.[62] But it will be regarded as an acceptance if the buyer uses more of the article than is fairly and reasonably necessary in making the test,[63] or prolongs the trial beyond a reasonable period.[64]

(III) DEALING IN THE GOODS. An acceptance will also be implied if the buyer retains the goods and resells them or a portion of them,[65] but a mere offer to sell before inspection, on delivery by the carrier, does not amount to an acceptance,[66] and the fact that an employee of the buyer unauthorizedly sold a small portion of the goods does not amount to an acceptance, where the buyer repudiated the sale upon learning of it, and directed the employee to replace the portion sold.[67]

it will not constitute a binding acceptance unless the condition is complied with,[72] but if absolute it cannot be withdrawn.[73] It relates back to the time of the sale[74] and binds the buyer for the price.[75] Where a large part of the goods have been accepted, the buyer cannot refuse to carry out the contract as to the balance on the ground of uncertainty in the contract as to the quality of the goods sold, the presumption being that the remainder was to be of the same quality as that accepted, and customary for the purposes needed.[76]

4. Evidence. Delivery of goods at the agreed place raises a presumption of acceptance,[77] especially where it appears that nothing remained for the seller to do,[78] or that any objection was made by the buyer.[79] Use creates a presumption of acceptance which, however, may be rebutted, the burden being on the buyer to show non-acceptance.[80] For the purpose of showing whether there has been an acceptance of the goods testimony as to declarations of the buyer is admissible,[81] but not declarations made prior to delivery.[82] Testimony as to acts of ownership exercised after suit was begun is inadmissible as there must have been acceptance prior to suit to justify a recovery,[83] and even when acts of ownership are shown, testimony in explanation thereof is proper.[84] Testimony as to payment of the price is admissible as tending to show acceptance.[85] Evidence is admissible tending to show a rejection and return of the goods,[86] or an offer to return,[87] but it may also be shown that the rejection was not in good faith.[88]

5. Questions For Jury. The existence of facts tending to show an acceptance of the goods is ordinarily for the jury,[89] as well as the ultimate fact of acceptance,[90] unless the law can pronounce upon a state of facts relative to a sale of goods that there is or is not a delivery and acceptance, in which case it is a question of law for the court.[91] So whether the buyer waives his right to reject for defective quality is ordinarily a question for the jury.[92]

D. Payment — 1. Obligation to Pay. As a general rule the obligation of the buyer to pay the price is a condition concurrent with the obligation of the seller to deliver,[93] especially when the contract provides merely that payment is to be made on delivery,[94] or where no time or place of payment for goods is specified in the contract of sale,[95] and although in such case the obligation of the buyer to pay is not absolute until there is a delivery,[96] yet he must be ready to pay to put the seller in default.[97] Payment may, however, be made a condition precedent by the terms of the contract.[98] The obligation to pay will of course become absolute on a proper delivery,[99] or an acceptance of the goods,[1] or at the expiration of the period fixed for trial and approval;[2] and in such case the buyer cannot impose additional conditions as precedent to payment.[3] But the obligation to pay may be modified by stipulations in the nature of conditions precedent to payment, in which case such conditions must be performed before the obligation to pay can be enforced.[4] Where goods delivered were such as were ordered,

Where there is a sale of goods to be paid for in cash on delivery, payment is a condition precedent to passing title to the vendee, and if on delivery payment is refused, and the goods are appropriated by the vendee to his own use, an action against him for the value will lie. Readiness to deliver.— Under a contract for the manufacture of puzzles, requiring the manufacturer to ship the puzzles "to some address to be designated in N. below 23d St.," but proving further that all work, as fast as finished, was to be held subject to the shipping instructions of the inventor, and that it was to be the latter's property "after completion," shipment to N was not a condition precedent to recovery of the contract price of their manufacture, but payment was to be made when they were finished and ready for delivery at the factory. Buedingen Mfg. Co. v. Royal Trust Co., 90 N. Y. App. Div. 267, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 621 [affirmed in 181 N. Y. 563, 74 N. E. 1115].

Modification as to quantity.— When a certain quantity of lumber has been agreed on, and the party who was to receive it refuses to accept the whole, he must give particular notice as to what quantity he will receive, or he will be liable to pay for the amount agreed on, if the same is delivered at the place appointed therefor. Blish v. Granger, 6 Vt. 340.

Part payment "on consignment."— Under a contract for the sale of a quantity of gunstocks of specified dimensions, thirty cents each of the price to be paid "on consignment," and the balance on receipt of the "inspector's report," if the stocks consigned corresponded to the description, the seller was entitled to the thirty cents each before inspection, and although some were rejected on inspection. Taking inventory.— A contract to purchase a partnership stock of goods when an inventory of the assets and liabilities of the firm shall have been taken and matter adjusted makes the taking of the inventory and adjustment a condition precedent to the liability of the buyer for the purchase-price. Payment in advance.— Where A covenanted to deliver to B, "between the 1st and 15th of November," so many hogs, "for which B was to give" so much per hundred, payable, etc., "one dollar in the head to be paid in advance," these were concurrent covenants, on which neither party could maintain an action without averring performance or a readiness to perform on his part, and the last clause required the payment of one dollar per head, to be made at the time of the delivery, and not before. Estill v. Jenkins, 4 Dana (Ky.) 75.

Payment in cash and notes.— A promise to pay for goods partly in cash, and the remainder by a note payable at a future date, is not a promise to pay on delivery. Harlow v. Sass, 38 Mo. 34.

Daily deliveries and payments.— Where an executory contract of sale is evidenced by two contemporaneous writings, one signed by each of the parties, that by the seller de-

the presumption being that a cash sale is intended.[9] Under such a contract the seller is entitled to demand payment immediately on delivery,[10] irrespective of the right of the buyer to inspect the goods [11] and is not under any obligation to part with his property until payment is made.[12]

b. Delivery in Instalments. Where delivery is in instalments and there is no agreement as to the terms of payment, it will be implied that payments are to be concurrent with delivery.[13] So too where the goods are to be delivered in instalments as ordered, payment must usually be made for each instalment ordered and delivered.[14] But when the contract is entire the mere fact that for convenience deliveries are made in instalments does not impose an obligation to pay for each instalment, but payment is not due until the delivery is com-claring the "terms of sale cash," and that by the purchaser reciting, "I shall pay bills daily," the two should be construed together to mean that bills are to be presented and payment made each day for the goods delivered during that day, the buyer having the whole day in which to make payment. Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Prentiss, 157 Ill. 506, 42 N. E. 157 [affirming 57 Ill. App. 507]. But see Genin v. Tompkins, 12 Barb. (N. Effect of custom.—Where goods are ordered by mail from a merchant accustomed to sell the buyer on credit, and nothing is said as to the terms of the sale, payment is not a condition precedent. Brooks v. Geo. H. Friend Paper Co., 94 Tenn. 701, 31 S. W. 160. But see Mihills Mfg. Co. v. Day, 50 Iowa 250, holding that a seller who has reasonable grounds for believing that the buyer is in embarrassed circumstances has a right to demand the cash, or reasonable security, before delivering the goods, even if the course of dealing between the parties were otherwise with respect to time of payment.

plete;[15] and a rescission of the contract by the seller does not impose on the buyer any obligation to pay for goods already delivered before the time for completing it has expired.[16] If, however, the buyer is not bound to accept a partial delivery and does so, the contract providing for payment on delivery, the seller is entitled to immediate payment for the portion delivered.[17]

4. Sales on Credit — a. In General. When property is sold without any expectation of immediate payment it is a sale on credit,[18] and the length of time for which payment is deferred, whether one day or a longer period, is of no consequence.[19] In a sale on credit time is of the essence of the contract as to payment,[20]

Discount for cash.— The fact that a sale is for a price fixed, less a certain discount for cash, does not import a sale on credit. Samuel M. Lawder, etc., Co. v. Albert Mackie Grocery Co., 97 Md. 1, 54 Atl. 634, 62 L. R. A. 795; Crooks v. Moore, 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 297; Moss v. Katz, 69 Tex. 411, 6 S. W. 764. If, however, there is an option of cash payment at a discount or by bill at three months, the mere failure to give the bill does not convert it into a cash sale. Anderson v. Carlisle Horse Clothing Co., 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 760. But see Rugg v. Weir, 16 C. B. N. S. 471, 111 E. C. L. 471.

Construction of contract.— Plaintiff contracted to sell goods as might be required by defendant during a specified period, payment to be made the twentieth of the month for the goods shipped the preceding month. After the expiration of the contract plaintiff agreed to sell a specified quantity of similar goods to be delivered at intervals and paid for on receipt of invoice and bill of lading. Subsequently defendant ordered additional goods. Plaintiff replied that he would enter the order for the additional goods, "terms same as present order," and sent a memorandum providing for cash payment on receipt of each invoice. Defendant modified the memorandum by adding "same as last," which was accepted by plaintiff. It was held, that the words "same as last" referred to the second agreement, and not to the first, especially in view of the fact that the parties so interpreted the words. Licking Rolling Mill Co. v. Synder, 89 S. W. 249, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 357. Where the purchaser of a machine on credit wrote the seller, telling him he might send the machine at once, provided he made the bill a certain postdate, and stated that he was going away, but would look after the bill on his return, and added, "You may send one of the ragpickers that you recommended, with the machine," the sale of the ragpicker was on credit, as a matter of law, and it was error to leave that question to the jury. James Smith Woolen Mach. Co. v. Holden, 73 Vt. 396, 51 Atl. 2.

Custom of trade.— Where it was a custom of trade to deliver goods sold for cash to be paid for on delivery, and call for a check in two or three days, such delay was not a credit, but simply an extension of time for the performance of the conditions. Fleeman v. McKean, 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 474.

Credit granted on condition.— Where, by the terms of a contract of sale, the purchaser is given time within which to pay on condition that he secure the debt, by his refusal to perform the condition the consideration for the grant of time fails, and the price is payable at once. Messenger v. Woge, 20 Colo. App. 275, 78 Pac. 314. If there is an agreement on the sale of goods that credit should be given, and as a security an agreement by the purchaser to give an acceptance, even though the purchaser refuses to give such acceptance, the period of credit still stands. Rabe v. Otto, 89 L. T. Rep. N. S. 562, 20 T. L. R. 27. See also Hoskins v. Duperoy, 9 East 498, 6 Esp. 58; Mussen v. Price, 4 East 147. But a condition as to an extension of credit must be complied with. Nickson v. Jepson, 2 Stark. 227, 3 E. C. L. 388.

Evidence.— If there be proof of the sale and delivery of goods, and no proof of payment, the presumption of the common law is that they were sold on credit. Edmunds v. Wiggin, 24 Me. 505. The burden is, however, on the purchaser to show that the sale was on credit. Whitlock v. Bueno, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 72. Evidence of the buyers' financial condition is admissible as showing an improbability of giving time on the purchase. Julius King Optical Co. v. Treat, 72 Mich. 599, 40 N. W. 912. The sufficiency of the evidence to show that the sale was on credit is considered in Flannery v. Harley, 117 Ga. 483, 43 S. E. 765; Zimmern v. Heinecke, 17 N. Y. Suppl. 728.

and although there is no obligation to pay until the term of credit has expired,[21] yet as soon as the term has expired the obligation becomes absolute.[22]

b. Term of Credit. The term of credit may be definitely fixed by the contract,[23] or it may be uncertain, as when payment is not to be made until returns from a sale of the goods can be received [24] or where payment is to be made as sales are made.[25] Such provisions do not, however, prolong the term of credit indefinitely but only for a reasonable time.[26] Even when the term of credit is fixed the contract may provide that the insolvency of the buyer or his discontinuance in business shall terminate the credit.[27] The term of credit for goods sold for subsequent delivery does not begin to run until the delivery of the goods,[28] or if there are several deliveries under an entire contract not for any specific articles but of goods of a kind, quality, and amount specified from the date of last delivery.[29] If the contract is divisible the term of credit for any particular article runs from the delivery of that article and not from the time the last article is delivered.[30] The buyer has the whole of the last day of the term in which to make payment.[31]

5. Mode and Sufficiency of Payment or Tender — a. In General. Payment unless otherwise agreed must of course be in legal tender,[32] and payment by check

Illustrations.— An agreement between A and B to cultivate multicaulus trees in partnership, A to furnish B with six hundred roots, at two dollars and fifty cents each, and B to pay A for one half of the same at that rate as soon as he could obtain funds by using all due diligence, and, if not paid within one month, with interest from date, was a sale at a credit of one month, which was not conditioned on the power of raising money. Moran v. Green, 21 N. J. L. 562. In an action for the price of goods sold where it appeared that plaintiff wrote defendant that his terms were "30 days, net, from date of shipment, or a cash discount of 5 per cent., if paid within 10 days from date of shipment," and defendant replied, "Will accept the cash price of 5 per cent. off," and plaintiff acknowledged receipt of such reply, defendant did not have the option to pay in thirty days from date of shipment, but payment became due ten days from the date of shipment. Godfrey v. Anderson, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 64, 33 S. W. 997. A sale at six months' credit, payment to be then made by a bill at two or three months, at the purchaser's option, is in effect a nine months' credit. Helps v. Winterbottom, 2 B. & Ad. 431, 9 L. J. K. B. O. S. 258, 22 E. C. L. 184.

Election.— Upon a sale of goods at six or nine months' credit, the purchaser, by not paying at the end of six months, makes his election to take credit for the nine months, and there is no debt till they are expired. Price v. Nixon, 2 Rose 438, 5 Taunt. 338, 1 E. C. L. 179.

Custom.— A sale of a horse, with the understanding that the purchaser should pay for it when he should receive certain wages, which by custom of the country would be due at the next Christmas, and that he could not pay for it until he received his wages, was a sale on credit until the next Christmas, and not until the receipt of the wages. is not sufficient [33] unless it is accepted as such.[34] By agreement, however, payment may be made in labor [35] or property,[36] but it must be made in the mode specified.[37] The purchaser takes upon himself the risk of making payment to the proper person.[38] In the absence of agreement to the contrary the place of delivery is the place of payment,[39] but this may be controlled by custom.[40]

Alternative stipulations.— A contract to pay for goods in gold coin or its equivalent in United States currency is not an alternative one as to mode of payment but merely fixes the price. Moppin v. Ætna Axle, etc., Co., 41 Conn. 27. See also Berry v. Nall, 54 Ala. 446.

Surrender of seller's note.— A seller is not obliged to accept in payment for chattels sold his own promissory note held by an undisclosed principal of the buyer, but can reclaim, or refuse to deliver, the things sold, upon the offer of such note. Bush v. Bender, 113 Pa. St. 94, 4 Atl. 213.

Effect of agreement.— The usual custom of collecting the purchase-money of goods, under a contract of sale between parties resident in different cities by draft, will not govern the express provisions of the contract fixing a mode of payment. Lawder, etc., Co. v. Albert Mackie Grocery Co., 97 Md. 1, 54 Atl. 634, 62 L. R. A. 795.

Payment from particular fund.— The word "receipts," as used in the indorsement of a contract for the purchase of machinery for a creamery that the buyer shall reserve a certain sum each day from the daily "receipts" of the creamery, and remit the balance to the seller, until the machinery is paid for, means the gross receipts from the creamery. Option as to kind of property.— Where defendant offered to purchase railroad ties of plaintiffs, and pay in stock of either of two corporations, as plaintiffs might elect, and plaintiffs wrote that they would sell the ties at the price offered, and take stock "in either the G. or D. roads," this did not necessarily mean that the option was to be exercised by defendant. Aldrich v. Bay State Constr. Co., 186 Mass. 489, 72 N. E. 53.

Where right to elect lost.— Where a purchaser has an election to pay either in money or property, if he fails to tender property on the day fixed for payment he loses his election, and the vendor has the right to demand money. Crowl v. Goodenberger, 112 Mich. 683, 71 N. W. 485.

37. Ellis v. Whitney, (Tex. Civ. App. 1908) 111 S. W. 158, in which case it appeared that plaintiff was working for defendant under a contract with several teams of mules. One team began to fail, and the parties made an agreement whereby defendant bought a new team to take its place; the bill of sale being made to defendant, and it being agreed that plaintiff was to pay defendant the purchase-price of three hundred dollars and interest by allowing fifty dollars to be deducted from his monthly payments for work, and upon full payment was to receive the mules. After one instalment of fifty dollars had been paid, plaintiff violated his contract by quitting defendant's service. It was held that plaintiff could only obtain title to the mules according to the agreement, and defendant was not obliged to accept the balance of the price after plaintiff had left his service and given him the mules.

Construction of contract.— In Owens v. Jackson, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 65 S. W. 1125, the contract was contained in a telegram to defendant as follows: "Wire f. o. b. Boston price scoured wool sight draft bill of lading;" and a reply by defendant, "Will take forty cents per pound f. o. b. here for scoured twelve months wool." Defendant claimed that the word "here" designated the place of payment, and not the place of delivery f. o. b. After sending an acceptance, plaintiff wired that payment was to be made in Boston by a sight draft, but this defendant refused, and required plaintiff to arrange with a designated bank for payment before shipments commenced, in compliance with which the bank designated was notified that it might make payments. It was held that plaintiff's actions showed acceptance of defendant's construction of the contract as to place of payment.

b. Notes or Other Obligations.[41] By agreement of the parties payment may be made by draft,[42] note, or order; but the mere giving of a note or order for the price will not constitute payment[43] unless the parties so agree.[44] Objections because of variance between the form of notes given and those which the seller agreed to accept may be waived by him and he may maintain his owner-

Rep. 163, holding that in an action on a contract by telegram, by which plaintiffs, who were merchants in Baltimore, Md., bought of defendant, a merchant in Indiana, five carloads of wheat, but which is silent as to the time and place of payment, a custom among merchants in Indiana may be proved to show that payment was to be made in Baltimore on the arrival of the wheat.

41. As affecting transfer of title see infra. VI, A, 5, d.

42. Patterson v. Stettauer, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. 54, holding that an agreement by the seller to deliver from day to day, for a period extending over several months, and by the buyer to pay on the first day of each month in drafts, drawn by the seller on the buyer at twenty days' sight, does not restrict the seller to drawing on the first of each month but a single draft for all the goods delivered during the preceding month.

Insolvency of buyer.— The secretary of a company engaged in the manufacture of bicycle tires sold a bill of goods to a company manufacturing bicycles, and also bought a number of bicycles from the latter. The tires were to be billed from the manufacturers, and paid for by a draft on the secretary, who was to charge the amount against the sum he owed for bicycles. It was held, in an action by the tire company against the bicycle company, that defendant became the debtor of plaintiff, and that the mode of payment, if binding on plaintiff at all, was binding only during the solvency of the secretary. Alteration of note.— Where plaintiff was to give defendant a note for certain property purchased, and defendant prepared the note, which plaintiff signed and returned to defendant; but before doing so, without defendant's knowledge, he erased a clause in the note making it negotiable, the acceptance of the note by defendant without examination when it was handed back to him was not negligence, and his giving an order thereupon for delivery of the property did not constitute a settlement which precluded him from refusing to retain the note or to deliver the property on learning of the erasure. Frum v. Keeney, 109 Iowa 393, 80 N. W. 507.

Obligation of third person.— Where a contract of sale of chattels provides that the purchaser shall pay by an order on a third person, and a note to be executed by such person to the seller, but the contract does not appear on its face to be made for such person's benefit, his mere approval creates no liability on his part, but the seller must show that such person promised to pay him, and that he made the contract and delivered the property in reliance on such promise. McCartney v. Hubbell, 52 Wis. 360, 9 N. W. 61. In Challoner v. Boyington, 83 Wis. 399, 53 N. E. 694, it was held that, when the note of a third person is received on the sale of goods, the note will be deemed to have been taken by the vendor in satisfaction, unless the contrary is expressly proved. On a sale by plaintiffs to defendants of lumber, to be paid for in promissory notes secured by mortgage executed by a third party and held by defendants, where nothing was said about defendants indorsing the notes, any assignment or transfer of the notes that would convey the title would fulfil the contracts in regard to them on the part of defendants. Paine v. Smith, 33 Minn. 495, 24 N. W. 305.

Liability as indorser.— Where a purchaser of goods transfers without indorsement a note in payment, and in a suit thereafter brought on the note a set-off is established by the maker, the seller may resort to the purchaser for the price of the goods. Jones v. Yeargain, 12 N. C. 420.

Assumption of debt by buyer.— Where defendant assumed the payment of a certain note as a part of the consideration of a purchase, plaintiffs agreeing to sign a renewal of the note as defendant's sureties if he should not be ready to pay at maturity, defendant, when sued for a breach of his agreement, cannot rely upon plaintiffs' breach of their agreement without alleging that he requested them to renew the note after its maturity. Muir v. Samuels, 110 Ky. 605, 62 S. W. 481, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 14.

Authority of agent.— Where a contract authorized agents to sell machinery, taking two notes in payment, the action of the agents in taking three notes not being in accordance with the contract, the seller was under no obligation to accept them. Plano Mfg. Co. v. Eich, (Iowa 1904) 97 N. W. 1106.

Approval of paper.— A sale for approved indorsed paper means, in law, a sale for paper which ought to be approved, and not for paper such as the seller may approve. Guier v. Page, 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 1. See also Hodgson v. Davies, 2 Campb. 530, 11 Rev. Rep. 789.

Effect of delay.— Upon an agreement to execute notes in payment of the price of goods sold, they must be executed within a reasonable time, or the whole sum becomes due forthwith. Hays v. Weatherman, 14 Ind. 341.

ship in them so long as the rights of innocent purchasers for value are not involved.[45]

c. Deductions.[46] If there is neither warranty nor fraud in the sale of a chattel, a defect in the quality does not entitle the buyer to any diminution in the price on that account.[47] He purchases at his peril.[48] If an article sold be of the slightest value to either the vendor or vendee, it will suffice by way of consideration for a promise to pay the agreed price, however disproportionate to the real value.[49] If, however, there is fraud on the part of the seller, the buyer, although he retains the goods without offering to return them, is entitled in case the goods are defective in quality, to a diminution in the purchase-price on account of such defects,[50] and if the goods are wholly worthless, this would present a complete defense to an action for the purchase-price, although no offer was made to return them.[51] Likewise if title to part of the chattels sold fails, the purchaser is entitled to a deduction pro tanto in the price agreed on;[52] and where there is a failure of title to all the chattels sold, the purchaser can treat the transaction as presenting an instance of an entire failure of consideration.[53] And the buyer may by the provisions of

But see Road Commissioners v. Macon, 2 Brev. (S. C.) 105, where it was held that commissioners of roads selling an estray as public agents are not liable for any implied warranty for a defect in the animal sold. But if the money be not paid over, defendant, the purchaser, may claim a discount for the unsoundness of the thing sold.

Illustration.— In the case of Chandelor v. Lopus, Cro. Jac. 4, 79 Eng. Reprint 3, it was held that for selling a jewel, which was affirmed to be a bezoar stone, when it was not, no action lay, unless defendant knew it was not a bezoar stone, or had warranted it to be one.

Failure to inspect.— One who fails to inspect at the place of shipment goods sold without special warranty is not entitled to a reduction of the purchase-price on the ground that the goods were of inferior quality, where an inspection would have disclosed their condition. Labrecque v. Duckett, 22 Quebec Super. Ct. 135.

Knowledge of defect.— Where plaintiffs offered cattle for delivery under their contract with defendants, to which defendants objected on account of their quality and the manner of their delivery, defendants could not, in the absence of consent by plaintiffs, receive the cattle, and compel plaintiffs to submit to a discount on the price. Gleckler v. Slavens, 5 S. D. 364, 59 N. W. 323.

Under the Louisiana statutes the buyer is given the right to claim a reduction of the price when the thing sold, although not of the character required by the contract, is susceptible of use. Civ. Code, art. 2541 et seq. Unless the object sold be absolutely useless, it is rather the duty of courts of justice to make a fair deduction from the price than entirely to avoid the sale, especially when the real value of the thing bears any reasonable proportion to the price agreed on. Beale v. De Gruy, 2 La. 468. Where a part of the goods are defective the purchaser will be relieved from paying for that part. C. S. Burk v. Laplace, 46 La. Ann. 722, 15 So. 293. Where goods were purchased in New Orleans to be shipped to Boston, which on arrival at the latter port were found damaged, and sold at a loss, after notifying the seller, and refusal to accept, it appearing from the evidence that they were damaged when sold in New Orleans, the purchaser is entitled to a deduction of the price, the amount of which is to be ascertained by the difference between the price for which they were sold and the market price of the articles in New Orleans at the date of the original sale. Foster v. Baer, 6 La. Ann. 442. The provisions of the statute cannot be extended so as to compel the party who has contracted for a filtering plant of fixed capacity as to quality, quantity, and in other respects, to pay some part of the price for a plant not capable of accomplishing the purposes specified in the contract. the contract be entitled to certain deductions under specified conditions.[54] Where the buyer is entitled to a certain discount if payment is made before a certain time, the discount can be claimed only on full payment before the expiration of the time specified.[55]

d. Tender. A tender in payment of the price is not sufficient unless it is made at the proper time[56] and place,[57] of the proper amount,[58] and in a proper medium of payment.[59] A tender of a check is not sufficient.[60] Under an agree-

Payment in instalments.— When payment is to be made in instalments any deduction from the price should be taken from the earlier instalment in the absence of any other agreement. Bennett v. McGillan, 28 Fed. 411.

Purchase of going concern.— An agreement by the seller of a newspaper business to pay any "indebtedness" of the paper contracted before the sale did not include the settlement of uncompleted advertising contracts for which the seller was paid in advance by the advertisers. Blew v. Collins, 61 Minn. 418, 63 N. W. 1091.

Commissions.— Where plaintiff agreed to deliver logs to defendant at a stated price per thousand feet, and the latter agreed to pay at the end of each month for the logs delivered during the month, "after deducting for all advances" and commissions at a specified rate, defendants were not entitled to commissions on disbursements made when they were indebted to plaintiff for logs delivered under the contract. Lee v. Byrne, 75 Ala. 132.

Agreement for allowance.— Where one agrees to allow a person a certain percentage off of the purchase-price of goods bought by him at a certain auction, the fact that some of the goods were bought by a third party, for the joint benefit of himself and the person with whom the agreement was made, does not affect the right of the latter to an allowance on the price. Nixon v. Zuricalday, 144 N. Y. 300, 39 N. E. 340.

Agreement to repair.— Where plaintiff sold a bicycle to defendant on monthly payments of ten dollars, with an agreement to keep it in repair, and defendant, with plaintiff's knowledge, took it for repairs to the manufacturer, which were made without charge, except in one instance, when four dollars and fifty cents was demanded by the manufacturer, and paid by defendant, in the absence of evidence that plaintiff acquiesced in such payment, or assumed to reimburse defendant therefor, defendant could not deduct it from his payment. Equitable General Providing Co. v. Stein, 16 Misc. (N. Y.) 582, 38 N. Y. Suppl. 774.

Sea damage.— Where, on a sale of hides through a broker, the bought and sold note of the broker, after reciting the sale, concludes: "No allowance except for sea damages. Price 12 cents per pound cash," the contract is for the purchase of all the hides at the price of twelve cents per pound, subject to a deduction from the price at the usual fair rate for any of the hides that were sea damaged. Bacon v. Gilman, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 456, 60 Barb. 640 [affirmed in 57 N. Y. 656].

55. Kellogg v. Barrett, 12 N. Y. Suppl. 670. Compare Godfrey v. Anderson, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 64, 33 S. W. 997, holding that where a merchant sells goods at "a cash discount of 5 per cent., if paid within 10 days from date of shipment," in an action for the price, on failure of the buyer to pay in ten days, defendant is entitled to the five per cent discount. It was said that the appellant having sold the goods on ten days' time, at a discount of five per cent, and having sued on such contract for the purchase-price must allow such discount.

Computation of discount.— Where goods were sold under a written contract at so much per load, "to be taken by the dock account and paid for in cash, allowing 2½ per cent. discount within fourteen days from the date; the goods to be taken on board and the duty deducted," and the duty was payable by the buyer, the discount was to be calculated on the sum to be received by the seller only, exclusive of the duty. 58. Bass v. White, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 171.

Amount.— Where on the sale of personal property the amount to be paid is to be determined by measurement of the property, a measurement which was grossly unfair as the result of fraud or mistake is not binding, and a tender based thereon does not entitle the purchaser to possession. 60. Bass v. White, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 171; Aiken v. Davis, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 44.

Waiver of objection.— Where the buyer

ment to accept notes in payment, a tender of worthless notes is insufficient.[61] Tender is excused where the seller has refused to fulfil his agreement to deliver,[62] and by inability to find the seller at his residence or usual place of business or after a careful search for him at the specified time for payment.[63] If a valid tender is refused the buyer is not obliged to make a second tender.[64] Where, in an action for a breach of contract for the sale of goods, the seller showed that he offered to deliver, but was prevented by the buyer's refusal to accept, and the buyer showed that the seller refused to allow the buyer to inspect the goods when offered, the question of a tender of the price was not in issue.[65]

e. Interest. The buyer is liable for interest on the purchase-price from the time the same becomes due,[66] and in the case of a cash sale from the delivery of the goods.[67] On a sale on credit interest begins to run from the expiration of the term of credit,[68] unless by the terms of the contract interest is payable from the date thereof.[69]

f. Evidence. No presumption of payment arises from the fact of delivery where nothing is said as to whether the sale is for cash or on credit,[70] and a recital of payment in a bill of sale has been held not to be conclusive of the fact.[71]

6. Default and Excuses Therefor. A default in making payment of the purchase-price may be ground for rescission of the contract,[72] or may be relied

Specific agreement.— An agreement for the sale of coal provided that the failure to make the first payment should render the agreement void, where no money was tendered until five months after the day pointed out, and not until two months after the formal notice of forfeiture, the agreement was on by the seller to excuse his default or delay in making delivery.[73] In accordance with general rules if the buyer has bound himself to a certain time or mode of payment, difficulty or impossibility of performance not due to the fault of the seller will not excuse his default.[74] But if the purchase-money is to be sent by express, the buyer is not liable for delay of the express company.[75] Failure or refusal of the seller to make a proper delivery will of course excuse default on the part of the buyer.[76] But where there is a substantial compliance on the part of the seller, a slight variance in the performance of his part of the contract from the provisions thereof will not excuse default on the part of the buyer.[77]

7. Waiver of Default. While payment at the time specified or implied in the contract may be waived by the seller [78] a waiver on condition will not become binding unless the condition is complied with.[79] Delivery of the goods without demanding payment is not necessarily a waiver of payment on delivery, but such conduct may be explained and controlled by other evidence.[80] So too where

Quality of goods.— Where a receiver, having contracted to sell a certain quantity of lumber, of different grades, at a uniform price, a higher price to be charged in case of partial performance and breach, payments to be made at stated intervals, cited the buyer to show why the contract should not be annulled for non-payment of an instalment, and the court gave him ten days in which to make the payment, the fact that the buyer, before expiration of the ten days, ordered the receiver to deliver the cheaper grade of lumber, which was refused, did not excuse him from his default, and throw the default on the receiver, since, if this were so, the buyer could claim the best quality, as well as the poorest, and secure it at the uniform price, to the extent of the advance payments made by him, despite his default. Pacific Lumber Co. v. Prescott, 40 Oreg. 374, 67 Pac. 207, 416.

Controlling circumstances.— The fact that upon a consignor's delivery of property to a carrier, and taking a bill of lading therefor, he retains the bill of lading, draws on the consignee for the price, sells the draft, and pledges the bill of lading, which represents the property shipped, to secure it, instead of sending the bill direct to the consignee, is a rebuttal of the presumption that it was an absolute delivery to the consignee, with intent to waive payment on delivery. Thomas v. Florida First Nat. Bank, 66 Ill. App. 56.

a note for the price is to be given on delivery the fact that delivery is made without receiving the note is not necessarily a waiver of the default.[81] Whether the delivery was made under such circumstances as to constitute a waiver is in such cases regarded as a question for the jury.[82] Default is not waived by a failure to cancel the contract on non-payment,[83] nor by basing a refusal to deliver on other grounds.[84] An unqualified acceptance of payments made after the time agreed on waives the delay,[85] and an acceptance of past-due instalments, accompanied by a renewal of the contract, will waive a forfeiture for such non-payment.[86] An agreement to give secured notes in payment is waived by the acceptance of unsecured notes,[87] and default in refusing to comply with a sale without opportunity for testing the goods sold is waived where the seller executes a new contract with a provision permitting such test.[88]

terms and expressions standing alone import an executed [98] or executory contract,[99] they are by no means conclusive but must be construed with reference to other provisions of the contract and according to what appears to have been the real intention of the parties,[1] and so a mere recital in the writing evidencing the contract that the article is "sold" or that the buyer has "purchased" it does not necessarily make the contract executed;[2] while on the other hand a recital that the seller "agrees to sell" is not conclusive that the title was not intended to pass immediately.[3]

2. Specific Goods — a. Intention of Parties. When the contract is for the sale of specific or ascertained goods the property in them is transferred to the buyer at such time as the parties to the contract intend it to be transferred, or in other words, if the goods are specific whether the contract of sale is executed or executory depends solely on the intention of the parties,[9] or as otherwise expressed, where neither the statute of frauds nor the rights of creditors are involved, the title will pass whenever the parties intend it to;[10] and while this intention must be manifested at the time the bargain is made,[11] it may be shown by circumstances as well as declarations,[12] and very slight acts are often sufficient to evince such intention.[13] The parties may make whatever agreement they see fit as to when the title shall pass,[14] and where the language of the agreement clearly and unequivocally manifests such intention, it will control;[15] but if, as

Suppl. 533, holding that where a person sells a horse which he does not own but expects to buy, and receives a portion of the purchase-price, the contract is executory and passes no title to the purchaser, but that when the seller does purchase the horse the title will vest in his vendee.

frequently happens, the intention is not clearly manifested, it must be ascertained by the rules of construction,[16] considering not only the language of the agreement, but also the subject-matter, situation of the parties, and other circumstances surrounding the transaction.[17] The courts have laid down certain rules in regard to when title passes, based upon the performance or non-performance of certain acts, or the existence or non-existence of certain facts and circumstances;[18] but they are merely rules of evidence to aid in ascertaining the intention of the parties,[19] and while a more or less conclusive presumption arises therefrom that the title was or was not intended to pass, it is not conclusive,[20] and will not control if a contrary intention is otherwise shown.[21] So where the intention of the parties is not clear, but must be determined from the facts and circumstances of the case, it is a question of fact for the jury.[22]

b. Illegality, Fraud, or Insolvency.[23] No title to the goods sold passes by a sale which is invalid because of illegality,[24] and the rule has also been laid down in many cases that, if the sale is procured by fraud, no title passes to the buyer as against the seller,[25] unless the seller in some way subsequently ratifies the

although the act is to be done by the buyer alone.[71] Other cases, however, make a distinction according to which party is to perform the act,[72] it being held that the rule that title does not pass should be limited to cases where the weighing, measuring, or other act is to be done by the seller or at least by the seller in connection with the buyer;[73] and that, if the seller has done all that is required of him with respect to the property, the title will pass, although something remains to be done by the buyer to ascertain the exact price,[74] particularly where there has been a delivery to the buyer.[75] As to the necessity for such acts as a prerequisite to the passing of title there is a clear distinction between cases where such acts are necessary to identify the goods and cases where the goods are already identified and such acts are merely for the purpose of ascertaining the price to be paid.[76] In the latter case the performance of such acts and the ascertainment of the price is not absolutely essential to the passing of title,[77] and whether they are to be performed and the price ascertained before the property passes depends upon the intention of the parties,[78] the general rule that the property does not pass until such acts are performed affording merely a presumption to this effect which is not conclusive;[79] and it has been held that if it further appears that the sale was on credit, there is no presumption that the parties did not intend that the title should pass until the price was ascertained.[80] So if it appears that the parties so intended the property will pass, although the acts necessary for ascertaining the price to be paid have not been performed,[81] and a delivery to the buyer is strong evidence of such an intention.[82] So also where weighing, measuring, or testing is necessary the title will ordinarily vest in the buyer as soon as such acts are performed,[83] although he may not be entitled to possession until the price is paid or secured.[84]

(2) Delivery Before Weighing, Measuring, or Testing. When the goods are to be weighed, measured, or tested for the ascertainment of the price, actual delivery of the goods before such act has been done is evidence of an intention to pass the property at once,[85] and such intention is also shown by a constructive delivery;[86] but if it otherwise appears that it was the intention of the parties that such weighing, measuring, or testing should be done before the title should pass, this intention will control notwithstanding there has been an actual delivery of the goods.[87]

(3) Loss or Destruction of Goods Before Act Is Done. If the goods are lost or destroyed while in possession of the seller and before the weighing, measuring, or other act by which the price is to be determined is done, the loss must fall upon the seller,[88] and the buyer may recover any advance made upon the purchase-price;[89] but if lost or destroyed after they have been delivered to the buyer with the intention of passing the title, the loss must fall upon the buyer,[90] and although the weighing or measuring originally contemplated has become impossible, the amount may be otherwise established and the seller recover therefor.[91]

(B) Other Modes of Ascertaining Price. The contract may contemplate the doing of other acts for the purpose of fixing the price, such as making an inventory or invoice,[92] or the arrangement of the terms of credit,[93] and under the general rule such acts must be performed before the property will pass,[94] although as in other cases the intention of the parties will control.[95]

appears;[14] but acceptance and approval to pass title in the goods may be express, or may be implied from the conduct of the buyer, as by his failure to reject and return the goods.[15]

f. Sale or Return. A sale or return is in the nature of a sale with an option to return if unsatisfactory,[16] or a sale upon condition subsequent,[17] and differs from a sale on trial or approval.[18] In the case of a sale or return the property in the goods passes to the buyer at once subject only to a defeasance by a return of the goods,[19] unless it appears that the intention is that the title shall remain in the seller,[20] as where payment of the price is made a condition precedent to the passing of the property.[21] If the buyer fails to return the goods within the time limited or within a reasonable time the sale becomes absolute.[22]

g. Consignment For Sale.[23] Ordinarily where goods are consigned by one person to another for sale by the latter, the title thereto remains in the consignor;[24]

but whether the consignee is to be considered as a buyer or an agent depends upon the intention of the parties,[25] and upon the real nature of the transaction rather than the language which the parties may have employed.[26] So where the transaction is such that the consignee acquires complete dominion over the goods with the right to sell them upon such terms and conditions as he may see fit, and is bound to pay the consignor a stipulated price therefor, it amounts to a sale and delivery and the title passes to the consignee,[27] and such transfer of title is not affected by the fact that the goods are not to be paid for until resold by the consignee,[28] or that he has an option of returning the goods which he has not resold.[29]

the sale is of goods which are not a part of any known or specific mass.[31] The subject-matter of the sale may, however, be a portion of a known or specific mass,[32] or may be goods not constituting a part of any specific mass but of an agreed kind which have not yet been set apart, identified, or appropriated to the contract.[33]

b. Goods Part of a Specific Mass — (I) In General. On a sale of goods which are part of a specific mass two conditions may arise: The mass may consist of goods of different kinds, qualities, sizes, weights, or values,[34] such as animals of a herd,[35] or trees upon the land of the seller,[36] in which case a selection is necessary to identify the particular articles sold;[37] or the mass may be of a uniform kind, quality, or value,[38] such as oil or grain in bulk,[39] or consisting of units, such as bags or barrels, of uniform size, quality, and value,[40] in which case the identification is complete upon a simple separation of the necessary quantity from the mass, and according to some decisions even a separation is not absolutely essential in order to pass title to the part sold.[41]

(II) Constituents of Mass Different. Where the goods or articles sold are part of a specific mass the constituents of which differ in kind, quality, or value the property does not pass until the articles have been identified by selection.[42] If, however, the sale includes all the goods or articles of a particular kind or quality which the mass contains, and this kind or quality is clearly distinguishable from the other kinds and qualities, the identification is sufficient,[43] and it is not necessary that the articles should be specially marked or separated from the other articles of different kind and quality;[44] but if the sale does not include all the goods or articles of a particular kind or quality, there must be a separation of the part sold from the remainder of the same kind or quality.[45]

(III) CONSTITUENTS OF MASS UNIFORM OR ALIKE. Where the sale is of a part of a specific mass the constituents of which are identical in kind, quality, or value, selection is of course unnecessary,[46] and there is a conflict of authority as to whether it is even necessary that there should be a separation.[47] The general rule and that which seems to be supported by the weight of authority is that even when the constituents of the mass are of the same kind, quality, and value, the property in any portion thereof will not pass by a contract of sale unless the portion has been identified by separation.[48] On the other hand there is a line of

Sale to partners.—Where lumber is sold to two persons who on the same day form a partnership to deal in lumber, the fact that the portion sold to each was not separated from the mass does not prevent the property from passing, as in such case they take as tenants in common and separation would serve no useful purpose. Smith v. Jones, 63 Ark. 232, 37 S. W. 1052.

Goods to which seller has not title.—Where one contracts for the sale of bark, to which he has no title, and also makes a contract with another for the purchase thereof, which contract describes it as one thousand cords of bark on certain land, whereon are piled about two thousand cords, no title passes under the former contract until separation to identify the goods. The converse proposition is also true, and the title will not pass if it appears that such was the intention of the parties Bailey v. Long, 24 Kan. 90; Rodee v. Wade, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 53.

Agreement to hold subject to buyer's order. — The execution and delivery by the seller of a receipt for a part of the purchase-money, declaring that he holds the goods subject to the buyer's order, shows an intention to transfer the title, although the part sold has not been separated from the general mass. Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 330, 75 Am. Dec. 334.

In California it is provided by Civ. Code, § 1140, that "the title to personal property, sold or exchanged, passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing itself is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not." Greenbaum v. Martinez, 86 Cal. 459, 25 Pac. 12.

case there is nothing to prevent the passing of title to the portion of the goods sold, although they are not actually separated from the mass if such is the intention of the parties;[51] and this intention may be either express or implied.[52] So the property sold will ordinarily be held to pass, although not separated from the general mass, where it has been paid for,[53] or there has been a delivery,[54] although such delivery is merely constructive,[55] as by the giving and acceptance of an order for the delivery of the goods addressed to the warehouseman or other person in whose custody they are.[56]

c. Goods Not Part of Specific Mass. The contract of sale may relate to goods of a particular description but not part of a specific mass, as when goods are ordered from a dealer. Under such contracts the property in the goods does not pass to the buyer until there has been appropriation of specific goods to the contract.[57]

There is a distinction between cases where the goods consist of units which are distinguishable from each other, such as horses and cattle, and cases where the units are not distinguishable, as grain in a storehouse or oil in tanks, and in cases of the latter character there may well exist an intention to transfer title to a number of bushels or gallons, although they have not been measured out of and separated from the mass. Delivery to common agent.—Where goods bought by two different purchasers are delivered to a common agent the title passes, although their respective portions have not been designated or set apart. Ropes v. Lane, 9 Allen (Mass.) 502. So also where a part of the mass is sold to one buyer and the remainder to another, and the whole is delivered to the first for himself and as agent of the other, the title passes as to both portions. Until some act takes place by which the relations of the warehouseman in respect to the property have been modified in accordance with the contract of sale, so that he may be considered as bailee for the seller and buyer respectively, according to their several interests, and is thus released pro tanto from his liability to the seller alone, title to any specific portion of the goods does not pass to the buyer, and so no title passes if the order is revoked before it is presented. Keeler v. Goodwin, 111 Mass. 490. Where, however, a certain number of parcels are sold from a stock stored in a warehouse by a bailee who is notified by both parties of the sale, and at the request of the buyer he agrees to keep the parcels over until called for, there is a sufficient delivery to pass title, although the particular parcels have not been separated from the others if all are of like size and quality. Carpenter v. Graham, 42 Mich. 191, 3 N. W. 974.

Sale of whole mass.—Where the whole of a specific mass is sold to different purchasers, orders on the warehouseman being given, which are accepted by him and new receipts issued to the various purchasers, the property will pass to the different purchasers without separation. d. Selection, Separation, or Appropriation — (I) In General. Appropriation, selection, or separation to pass the property must be an actual choice of a specific article or specific goods to be supplied in performance of the contract,[58] and must be manifested by some unequivocal act, a mere intention to appropriate being insufficient.[59] Moreover the act of appropriation must be complete and in fulfilment of the contract.[60] Thus if the seller is to deliver at a particular time and at a particular place, merely setting the goods aside with the intent to make delivery is not such an appropriation as will pass the property in the goods.[61] So also where the goods are to be loaded the property in them does not pass as the separate portions are put in the car or vessel, but there is no appropriation until the loading is complete.[62]

(II) Acts Constituting Appropriation. Any act indicating a definite intention to appropriate the goods to the contract is sufficient, such as setting apart and marking the goods for the buyer,[63] pointing out the goods to the buyer [64] or to the warehouseman in whose custody they are,[65] putting the goods in the

The word "appropriation" may be used in different senses. It may mean a selection by the seller where he has the right to choose the article which he is to supply in performance of his contract, or it may mean that both parties have agreed that a certain article shall be delivered in pursuance of the contract, yet the property may not pass in either case. On the other hand the word "appropriation" may be used in another sense, as applying to a case where both parties agree upon the specific article in which the property is to pass, and nothing remains to be done in order to pass it. Sahlman v. Mills, 3 Strobh. (S. C.) 384, 51 Am. Dec. 630.

receptacles therefor supplied by the buyer,[66] or otherwise putting them in deliverable shape.[67] The appropriation may be indicated by a delivery of the goods [68] or their delivery to a carrier.[69] Where the goods sold constitute a part of a specific mass a removal of all of the remainder of the mass is a sufficient segregation and appropriation of the part sold,[70] or if the whole mass is delivered to the buyer for the purpose of selecting and removing therefrom his part, the title to such part will pass immediately upon the delivery of the mass.[71]

(III) PERSON MAKING APPROPRIATION. While the selection and appropriation of the goods may be made by either party or both parties,[72] yet where the goods sold are not specific the property does not pass until an appropriation of the specific goods has been made with the assent of both parties,[73] and so an appropriation by the seller alone will not pass title unless assented to by the buyer.[74] This assent may, however, be either express or implied,[75] and may be given by one party either before [76] or after the act of appropriation by the other.[77] Where by the terms of the contract the seller is to do some act with reference to the goods which from its nature cannot be done until there is an appropriation, he is impliedly authorized to make it;[78] and if the goods sold constitute a part of a specific mass and the whole mass is delivered to the buyer, he is authorized to select and appropriate the part purchased.[79] If the seller is simply to procure goods of a certain kind and hold them until called for by the buyer, an appropriation of particular goods by the seller will not, in the absence of prior authority, pass title unless assented by the buyer,[80] although it has been held that if the buyer does not call for the goods and exercise his right of selection within the time limited by the contract, the title will pass.[81] Where by the terms and conditions of the contract the appropriation is to be made by the seller, the title ordinarily passes as soon as he has made such appropriation;[82] but the title will not pass if such appropriation is not made in accordance with the terms of the contract,[83] as where the goods appropriated are not the kind or quality agreed upon,[84] or are not shipped at the time stipulated,[85] unless the buyer with knowledge of the facts subsequently assents thereto;[86] but if the appropriation is made in accordance with the terms of the contract, the title passes without any subsequent assent on the part of the buyer.[87]

(IV) OPERATION AND EFFECT. In the absence of anything to show a contrary intent the property in the goods passes to the buyer when the selection, separation, and appropriation is complete,[88] provided nothing else remains to be done to complete the contract,[89] and the effect of the separation and appropriation is not destroyed because the goods are subsequently intermixed with the original mass.[90] Until the appropriation is completed, however, a tentative selection is not conclusive and may be withdrawn and other goods substituted provided they comply with the contract.[91]

e. Goods to Be Manufactured or Produced — (1) In General. A contract for the sale of an article not in existence but to be manufactured is an executory contract,[92] under which no property in the article will pass during the progress of the work nor until the article is completed and ready for delivery,[93] unless a contrary intention clearly appears,[94] and this rule is not necessarily affected by the fact that the buyer furnishes a part of the material,[95] or superintends the work of manufacture or construction,[96] or pays the price in advance,[97] or in instalments as the work progresses,[98] or even by the fact that during the process of seller has until the day of delivery to determine what particular flax he will deliver, and that the fact that he previously makes a tentative selection of the flax which he intends to deliver does not vest any title to that particular flax in the buyer, but that the seller may change his mind and substitute other flax of like kind and quality. construction the article is so identified and appropriated to the contract that the seller would be bound to deliver that particular article and could not substitute another similar article, which would otherwise correspond with the agreement.[99] But while the general rule is that the property does not pass until the article is finished and delivered or at least ready for delivery, unless a contrary intention appears,[1] it is equally true that it is competent for the parties to agree that the article to be manufactured or produced shall from the beginning or at any stage of its production be the property of the buyer,[2] and the courts will not enforce any arbitrary rules of construction as to when the title passes,[3] but will carry into effect the intention of the parties as shown by the terms of the agreement and the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction.[4] So if it appears that such was the intention of the parties, the title will pass, although the article has not been completed.[5]

Goods not corresponding to order.— If the goods do not correspond to the order the buyer is not bound to accept them and the title will not pass if he refuses to do so (Hallidie v. Sutter St. R. Co., 63 Cal. 575); and where the contract contemplates that the buyer is to take and test the article to ascertain if it will answer the purpose intended, this acceptance will not pass title the property will pass, although the buyer refuses to accept.[14] The intention of the parties will, however, govern,[15] and if such intention appears the property will pass on completion and appropriation without delivery or acceptance,[16] or even before its final completion.[17]

(III) Crops or Animals to Be Grown or Produced.[18] Where the subject-matter of the sale is crops or trees to be grown or produced the contract is an executory one under which no present title passes to the buyer;[19] but the title will pass as soon as the crop appears or comes into existence,[20] or at least as soon as it is matured,[21] unless under the contract something still remains to be done between the buyer and the seller in relation thereto,[22] or the crop to be produced must conform to certain specifications,[23] no actual change of possession being necessary to make the sale complete even as against third persons.[24] So also under a sale of unborn animals the title will pass as soon as the animal is born.[25]

the time of the contract, but that the title will vest in the buyer whenever the slave is delivered, or, if at large, is captured by and taken possession of by the buyer.

as to the intention of the parties in regard to the transfer of title is usually one for the determination of the jury.[34]

(II) As to Third Persons — (A) In General. While it is well settled that as between the parties a delivery is not essential to a transfer of title,[35] the general rule is that as against creditors of or subsequent purchasers from the seller, there must be a delivery of the goods,[36] and it does not affect this rule that the price has been paid,[37] or notes given therefor.[38] But delivery is not essential to pass the property in the goods as against trespassers or wrong-doers.[39]

(B) Change of Possession. It is ordinarily held that the delivery required by the rule above stated in order to pass title as against creditors of or subsequent purchasers from the seller [40] must be a delivery in its natural sense, that is, a change of possession,[41] and that there must be an actual, visible, and continuous change of possession,[42] such as to apprise those accustomed to deal with the seller that the ownership of the goods is changed,[43] or in other words such a manifest, continued, and open change of possession as to indicate to the world a change of title;[44] and so it is not sufficient that there has been an actual delivery and actual change of possession if the goods are returned to the apparent possession of the seller so as to indicate that there had been no actual change of title.[45] In the application of this rule, however, certain qualifications must be recognized, depending upon the character and situation of the property,[46] and as against creditors a change of possession is not necessary in the case of property which at the time of the sale is not subject to execution or attachment.[47] So also actual notice of the sale may take the place of a change of possession,[48] either as against a creditor of or a subsequent purchaser from the seller.[49]

b. Effect of Delivery. A delivery to the buyer will, in the absence of anything to indicate a contrary intent, transfer the property in the goods as against the seller, his creditors, or subsequent purchasers,[50] although the price has not been to accept,[60] as where the goods do not conform to the requirements of the contract,[61] or are not delivered at the time stipulated,[62] unless the buyer does in fact accept them.[63] So also while a delivery is perhaps the most significant fact as indicating an intention to transfer the title, it is not conclusive,[64] and notwithstanding there has been a delivery the property will not pass if it appears that such was the intention of the parties,[65] as when payment is made a condition precedent to the passing of the property.[66]

c. Mode and Sufficiency of Delivery and Change of Possession — (1) In General. In cases where a delivery is necessary to pass title as between the parties,[67] such delivery must be made in accordance with the terms of the contract;[68] but except as affected by the provisions of the contract, whether particular acts are sufficient to constitute a delivery which will pass title depends primarily upon whether they were so intended by the parties.[69] As against creditors of and subsequent purchasers from the seller the general rule is that the delivery must consist in an actual and continuous transfer of possession;[70] but this rule must be applied in view of the character and situation of the property and circumstances of the particular case,[71] and although such possession as the purchaser

Express condition unnecessary.— To constitute a conditional delivery it is not necessary that the seller should declare the condition in express terms at the time of the delivery, but it is sufficient if the intent of the parties that the delivery be conditional can be inferred from their acts and the circumstances of the case. Gibson v. Chicago Packing, etc., Co., 108 Ill. App. 100.

Waiver of condition by buyer.— Where the buyer is to be allowed to test the goods before final acceptance, this is a condition in his favor which he may waive, and the seller has no right to insist that the goods shall not be accepted until tested, and if the buyer does any act which shows that he has waived such condition and accepted the goods delivered, the title will vest in him. Van Winkle v. Crowell, 146 U. S. 42, 13 S. Ct. 18, 36 L. ed. 808.

Where a seller's agent makes an unauthorized conditional delivery of property to the buyer, the seller cannot convert such delivery into an unconditional one so as to pass title to the buyer against his consent and refusal to accept. Nichols, etc., Co. v. Paulson, 6 N. D. 400, 71 N. W. 136.

can reasonably take must be taken,[72] it is not essential even as against creditors and subsequent purchasers that there should in all cases be an actual manual delivery or a change of possession at the time of the sale.[73] So no actual delivery and transfer of possession is necessary where from the nature or situation of the property it is impossible or impracticable,[74] as in the case of goods which at the time of the sale are situated at a distance,[75] whether on land or water,[76] or which are of such a bulky or ponderous nature that an actual manual delivery is impracticable.[77] The most that is demanded is that there shall be such a delivery and change of possession as may be practicable in view of the character and situation of the property,[78] and very slight acts will be sufficient where the sale is in good faith.[79] If the property is so situated that an immediate delivery is impossible it is sufficient if the buyer takes possession as soon as he is able to do so,[80] and where from the character or condition of the goods an actual manual delivery is impracticable, a constructive or symbolical delivery is sufficient.[81] So also in determining what is an actual delivery the nature of the property and circumstances attending the sale must be taken into consideration,[82] and as a general

82. Barr v. Reitz, 53 Pa. St 256, 258, where the court said: "The principle which underlies all the cases is, that there must be an actual separation of the property from the possession of the former owner at the time of the sale, or within a reasonable time afterward, according to the nature of the property delivered. But in effectuating this change, what difference does it make whether the property be removed from the owner or the owner remove from the property? It is not the mere place the property occupies which gives color of possession to the former owner, but it is the connection the place rule it is sufficient to pass the property as against third persons if there is on the part of the buyer an assertion of ownership by acts of dominion and control over the goods.[83] Whether there has been a sufficient delivery and change of possession is ordinarily a question for the jury.[84]

(II) Time of Delivery or Change of Possession. Where a delivery is necessary to pass title as between the parties, it must be made at the time stipulated in the contract; [85] but in the absence of express stipulation it is not necessary as between the parties that the delivery should be at the time of the contract.[86] As against creditors of or subsequent purchasers from the seller, the buyer must, if it is practicable to do so, take possession at once,[87] or at least within a reasonable time,[88] that is, as soon as the nature of the subject-matter and the circumstances of the case will permit; [89] but the delivery need not be immediate, the buyer being entitled to what is a reasonable time according to the character and situation of the property and other circumstances of the case for acquiring possession.[90] So in cases where an immediate delivery is impossible, as in the case of a ship at sea or property situated at a distance, the buyer will acquire a good title if he takes possession within a reasonable time after it is possible for him to do so, itself has with the owner indicating his apparent control over it."

But see Burnell v. Robertson, 10 Ill. 282, holding that under a sale of various articles which are scattered over a considerable area of country, the buyer, although he is proceeding with all reasonable despatch to get possession thereof, will not acquire title as against creditors of the seller who attach goods included in the sale before the buyer actually acquires possession.

Although the statute requires immediate delivery, a delivery within a reasonable time, in view of the character and situation of the property and the circumstances of the transaction, will be held to be sufficient. Samuels v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 226.

Delivery prevented by wrong-doer.— Where after a sale and before the buyer in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence can get possession of the property, a trespasser takes the property and secretes it and then it is

although the property has been attached before he could acquire possession.[91] In some cases it has been held that the buyer acquires a good title as against creditors if he acquires and retains possession of the goods prior to the levy of a creditor's execution or attachment,[92] although he did not do so within a reasonable time;[93] but on the contrary it has been held that if there has been an unreasonable delay the buyer does not acquire a good title as against creditors, although he acquires possession before the levy is made.[94] What is a reasonable time under the circumstances for acquiring possession is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury,[95] but under some circumstances may be a question of law for the court.[96]

(III) PROPERTY IN POSSESSION OF BUYER. Where the goods sold are already in the possession of the buyer at the time of the sale, no further act of delivery is ordinarily essential;[97] but if the buyer has been in possession as servant of the seller, there must be something to indicate the change in the character of his possession,[98] and the same rule applies to a joint or concurrent possession by the buyer and seller.[99]

(IV) PROPERTY IN POSSESSION OF THIRD PERSON. Since as between the parties it is not necessary that the seller shall be in possession of the property at the time of the sale,[1] or that there shall be a delivery to the buyer,[2] the property will ordinarily pass, unless a contrary intention appears, although the goods are in possession of a third person.[3] As against creditors of and subsequent pur-

Character of bailment.— In the application of this rule a distinction has been suggested based upon the character of the bailment, it being said that if such person has no right or interest in the property but is a mere custodian or keeper for the owner, there would be some propriety in requiring that he should assent to become the keeper for or the bailee of the buyer, but that if the person in possession has a right of possession in himself and is not a mere naked bailee, the buyer has no choice, and that all that he can or property is given to the buyer and accepted by the person in possession;[13] or without any presentation and acceptance of the order if such third person is notified of the sale;[14] or, it has been held, without either presentation or notice if the buyer has not been guilty of any unreasonable delay in respect to such presentation or notice.[15]

(v) Property Remaining in Possession of Seller. Unless a contrary intention appears the property will pass as between the parties, although the goods remain in the custody of the seller as bailee of the buyer,[16] and notwithstanding the seller has a right to retain possession, until the price is paid;[17] but under the rule requiring an actual change of possession a sale of goods which remain in the possession of the seller vests no property in the buyer as against creditors and subsequent purchasers,[18] nor is it sufficient that there is an actual change of possession if it is merely temporary and the property is returned to the possession of the seller.[19] There will, however, be a delivery and change of possession sufficient to pass the property as against third persons, although the goods remain in the apparent possession of the seller, if it clearly appears that he is in possession merely as an employee of the buyer,[20] or that he is in possession as a should be required to do is to give the bailee notice of the sale. See Wooley v. Edson, 35 Vt. 214.

Employment of seller's servant.— Where cattle sold were in charge of an agent of the seller, and on presentation of an order from the seller the agent pointed out the cattle declaring that he delivered them to the buyer, the employment of such agent to take charge of the cattle for the buyer does not render bailee,[21] or trustee for the buyer;[22] but there must be some act or circumstance to indicate the change in the character of his possession and give notice to the world of the change of ownership,[23] or the possession will be regarded as continuing in the seller.[24] If the seller becomes a tenant of the buyer his possession as tenant is the possession of the buyer, and is not evidence of his continued ownership.[25]

Incidental use.— The fact that the brother of the vendor drove the team sold both before and after the sale cannot be regarded as conclusive evidence against the continuity of possession in the purchaser. O'Gara v. Lowry, 5 Mont. 427, 5 Pac. 583.

Sale by father to minor son.— A father may contract with his minor son to pay the latter wages for his services, and may, in satisfaction of the debt, deliver to him personal property. In such cases the possession of the father becomes that of the son, and the property will not be subject to attachment for the purchase-money, although found in the possession of the father. Such possession is not inconsistent with the minor's title as against third persons. Hargrove v. Turner, 112 Ga. 134, 37 S. E. 89, 81 Am. St. Rep. 24.

Sale by husband to wife.— Where a husband sells to his wife who is living with him on a farm certain farm animals, and there is no delivery except the delivery of a bill of sale, the animals remaining in the possession of the husband, and being used by him in the same manner as before the sale, there is no sufficient delivery or change of possession as against creditors. McKee v. Garcelon, 60 Me. 165, 11 Am. Rep. 200.

Buyer as employee of seller.— If the buyer is a servant of the seller and the goods sold remain in the apparent possession of the seller without anything to indicate the change of ownership, there is not a sufficient change of possession as against creditors and subsequent purchasers. Hull v. Sigsworth, 48 Conn. 258, 40 Am. Rep. 167 [distinguishing Elmer v. West, 47 Conn. 56]; Hickok v. Buell, 51 Iowa 655, 2 N. W. 512.

If the goods remain in the same building where they have been kept before the sale and there is no change in the occupancy or possession of the building which is the property and in possession of the seller, the change of possession is not sufficient. Boothby v. Brown, 40 Iowa 104.

The absence of acts of ownership or control on the part of the seller is not sufficient evidence of an actual transfer of possession to the buyer. Hickok v. Buell, 51 Iowa 655, 2 N. W. 512; Boothby v. Brown, 40 Iowa 104.

Sale of stock of goods.— Where the owner of a store sells his stock of goods to another and a new sign is put on the building bearing the name of the buyer, and bills are thereafter made out in the name of the buyer, there is a sufficient change of possession, although the seller remains in the store assisting the buyer in attending to the business. Rothermel v. Marr, 98 Pa. St. 285. Compare Young v. Poole, (Cal. 1887) 13 Pac. 492. But it is not sufficient where no notice of the sale is given, and the only acts indicating a change of ownership consist in insuring the goods in the name of the buyer, opening a new set of books, billing goods sold in the name of the buyer, and placing the proceeds to his credit, the stock of goods remaining in the custody of the same persons as before. Dooley v. Pease, 180 U. S. 126, 21 S. Ct. 329, 45 L. ed. 457 [affirming 88 Fed. 446, 31 C. C. A. 582].

Merely walking around a pile of lumber which is left on the land and in the apparent possession of the seller is not sufficient to obviate the necessity of other notice as against a subsequent purchaser. Black Rock Bank v. Decker, 65 Ark. 33, 44 S. W. 220.

(VI) SEGREGATION AND SETTING APART. Although the goods remain in the physical possession of the seller, yet there is such a delivery as will pass the property in the goods even as against third persons if they are segregated and set apart for the buyer,[26] or marked as his property.[27] If, however, the goods are part of a mass merely marking them without separating them from the mass is not sufficient.[28]

(VII) POINTING OUT OR PLACING GOODS AT DISPOSAL OF BUYER. In many cases it is sufficient to pass the property in the goods, even as against third persons, if the seller points them out with a declaration that they are turned over to the buyer as his property,[29] or places them at the disposal of the buyer who is given access to and opportunity to remove them,[30] particularly if the character of the goods is such that an actual manual delivery is impracticable.[31] The buyer should, however, without unreasonable delay, remove the goods, or at least exercise some acts of ownership or control over them,[32] as it is not alone sufficient that the goods are pointed out to the buyer if he afterward exercises no act of ownership over them,[33] or that he has access to and a right to remove them if he makes no attempt to do so;[34] nor is it sufficient merely that they have been placed upon the land of the buyer.[35] The sale must of course be otherwise complete,[36] and it must be the intention of the parties that the property shall pass.[37]

Limitation of rule.— The rule that delivery by the seller to a carrier transfers the title to the buyer does not apply to a sale between parties not distant from each other, without clear proof that he was a common carrier in the legal sense. A drayman carrying from one part of a city to another is not conclusively a common carrier. Charles v. Lasher, 20 Ill. App. 36.

Goods not ordered.— Delivery of goods to a carrier, to be shipped to one who has not ordered them, does not vest in such consignee the title to the goods; and the shipper may, while the goods are in transit, order them delivered to another person. Ruhl v. Corner, 63 Md. 179. But if by a course of dealing between a merchant in a city and another in the country, the former is authorized to send goods to the latter without special order, the property in goods so sent vests in the latter from the delivery to the carrier. Wrong delivery.— Where the seller of merchandise agreed with the vendee to deliver it on board a brig lying at pier No. 9, North river, but by mistake of the carman it was delivered to another brig lying at pier No. 9, East river, and a receipt for the merchandise was signed by the master of the latter brig, which sailed before the mistake was discovered, and the seller then delivered similar merchandise on the other brig in fulfilment of his contract, it was held that the title to the merchandise shipped on the wrong brig remained in the vendor, so that he could sue such brig for the value thereof. property will not pass if the seller retains the right of disposal of the goods,[48] or the passing of the property is made conditional on the payment of the price.[49]

(B) Where Goods Are to Be Carried to Place of Delivery. Under the general rule that the property does not pass if any act connected with the subject-matter remains to be done,[50] if the goods sold are to be transported by the seller to the place of delivery, the property, unless a different intention appears, will not pass until this is done.[51] As soon, however, as the delivery is completed the property

Indorsement of bill of lading.— Where a manufacturer, under directions from the seller of goods, ships them directly to the purchaser, and the bill of lading is made out in the name of the seller, who indorses it to the purchaser, the title, on indorsement of the bill of lading and delivery of the goods to the carrier, passes to the purchaser. In whom title vests.— Where a bill of lading for goods consigned is special to deliver the goods to the consignee for the use or on account of a third party, the property in the goods vests in the latter and not in the consignee. Richardson v. Hutchinson, 20 Fla. 21. Where a wire company instructed its correspondents to purchase iron rods for it, and to take and receive the bills of lading therefor, to hold as security for the repayment of the purchase-money, the title to the goods vested in the correspondents, although the company's agents obtained possession of bills of lading from the shippers, where they immediately indorsed and delivered them to the correspondents in exchange for the latter's acceptances. Payment of freight by seller.— Where an agreement to sell and ship property to a distant point does not expressly provide for delivery, the fact that the seller is to pay the freight and furnish the property at the destination for a specified price, without cost to the buyer, is some evidence that the title was not to pass until delivery was made. Hunter Bros. Milling Co. v. Kramer, 71 Kan. 468, 80 Pac. 963. But the mere fact that the seller contracts to see the goods "f. o. b." at the buyer's place of business does not, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, cause the title in the goods to remain in the seller after delivery to the carrier and until they arrive at the buyer's place of business, but merely means that the seller will pay the freight to that place. will pass,[52] and the property will pass notwithstanding the seller is to make such delivery if such is the intention of the parties,[53] and this intention may be inferred from a payment of the price.[54]

(IX) DELIVERY TO THIRD PERSON. It is sufficient to pass the property as against creditors or subsequent purchasers if delivery is made to a third person on account of the buyer,[55] or to a warehouseman designated by the buyer to receive the goods.[56]

(X) CONSTRUCTIVE OR SYMBOLICAL DELIVERY — (A) In General. Since as between the parties, in the absence of any agreement or intention to the contrary, an actual delivery is not necessary,[57] a constructive or symbolical delivery is sufficient,[58] particularly in cases where an actual delivery is impracticable,[59] and even as against third persons, if the nature or situation of the goods is such that an actual delivery is impracticable, the property may be transferred to the buyer by a constructive or symbolical delivery.[60] Such delivery may be made by the delivery of some symbol, such as the key of the building containing the goods,[61]

Sale of logs.— A contract for the sale of timber under which the seller, upon cutting and skidding the logs, is to be paid a certain price per thousand feet, and upon banking them is to receive an additional sum, and when they are put afloat by the seller he is to receive the balance due, remains executory until the logs are put afloat, and while upon the bank of the stream the purchaser is not entitled to take possession thereof. Character of goods.—While a symbolical delivery may be sufficient in the case of actual chattels, such as logs in a boom, and which are as capable of possession by one party as the other, and the parties intend an immediate and unqualified transfer to the buyer, the rule does not apply to the sale of grass which at the time is not matured and not fit to be cut, and is not intended to be cut until grown, and plucking a handful of such grass and delivering it to the buyer is not a constructive delivery which will pass title as against third persons. a bill of sale,[62] ginner's receipt,[63] warehouse receipt or order,[64] bill of lading,[65] or other documents constituting indicia of title.[66] Such a delivery should, however, be followed by some act on the part of the buyer tending to show ownership and control of the goods.[67]

(B) Warehouse Receipt or Order.[68] Where the goods are deposited in a warehouse, the property therein will pass by the delivery of a warehouse receipt,[69] or an order on the warehouseman or other person actually in possession, for the delivery of the goods to the purchaser,[70] provided the transfer of the receipt is assented to, or the order accepted by, the warehouseman,[71] or he is notified of the sale,[72] and if, the goods sold being part of a mass, there is an appropriation.[73]

Necessity for assent or acceptance.— As against creditors and subsequent purchasers it has been held that the transfer of the receipt must be assented to or the order accepted by the warehouseman (Hallgarten v. Oldham, 135 Mass. 1, 46 Am. Rep. 433); but on the other hand it has been held that this is not essential if the buyer has not been guilty of any unreasonable delay in presenting the order or receipt or in giving notice thereof (Puckett v. Reed, 31 Ark. 131; Gibson v. Stevens, 8 How. (U. S.) 384, 12 L. ed. 1123).

73. Coffey v. Quebec Bank, 20 U. C. C. P.

But the acceptance of the delivery order will not transfer the property if something remains to be done, such as weighing or measuring, to identify the goods or ascertain the quantity sold.[74]

(c) Bill of Lading or Shipping Receipt. A bill of lading or shipping receipt is regarded as symbolical of the goods, so that a transfer and delivery of the document is sufficient to pass the property in the goods,[75] provided the delivery of the bill of lading is unconditional,[76] is made by one rightfully in possession thereof,[77] and is not intended as a mere pledge.[78]

(XI) PARTIAL DELIVERY. An entire executory contract of sale may be divisible in the performance thereof so that, if such is the intent of the parties, a delivery of a part of the goods will pass the property in such part to the buyers,[79]

R. 426], holding that where on a shipment of goods a bill of lading is sent to the buyer with draft for acceptance, and the buyer without accepting the draft transfers the bill of lading to a subpurchaser, who pays for the goods in good faith without notice of any lack of authority on the part of his vendor to deal with the bill of lading, the original buyer had obtained possession of the bill of lading with the consent of the original seller within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act of 1893, so as to pass title to the subpurchaser and defeat the original seller's right of stoppage in transitu.

even as against third persons;[80] but where a specific quantity is sold to be loaded on a car or vessel, the property in the goods does not pass as fast as they are loaded,[81] unless it appears that such was the intention of the parties.[82] In some cases it has been held that a delivery of a part of the goods is sufficient to pass title to the whole,[83] even as against creditors of the seller;[84] but in others it has been held that a partial delivery to the buyer does not pass title to the part not delivered.[85]

5. Payment of Price — a. In General. It is not essential to a transfer of the property in goods sold that the price should be actually paid,[86] even where the buyer is not entitled to possession until such payment is made;[87] nor is it essential that the price be fixed if the parties have agreed on a method by which it is to be determined.[88] The title will also pass as against creditors and subsequent purchasers without payment, if there has been a delivery to the buyer.[89] But even as between the parties the title will not pass until payment if by the terms of the contract such payment is a condition precedent,[90] or it otherwise appears that such was the intention of the parties,[91] unless the condition as to payment is waived.[92]

b. Sale on Credit. Where the sale is on credit, unless a different intention is manifested by agreement or otherwise, the property in the goods passes on delivery to the buyer,[93] and in the absence of delivery the property may pass except as to third persons, although the seller retains the right of possession until the price is paid.[94] If, however, the parties, by the terms of the agreement or otherwise, show that the intention was that the property should remain in the seller until the whole price is paid such intention will be given effect.[95] The most common form of contract of this nature is the "conditional sale" so called.[96]

c. When Sale Is For Cash. While sales made for cash or cash on delivery are not strictly speaking conditional sales,[97] they are frequently so called,[98] and are conditional in the sense that payment is to be precedent to or at least concurrent with delivery.[99] So it is ordinarily held that where the sale is expressly for cash or cash on delivery, no title passes to the buyer until payment is made,[1] unless the condition as to payment is waived by the seller,[2] although there may have been a delivery of the goods.[3] In some jurisdictions there are statutes expressly providing that in the case of certain sales title shall not pass until payment is made.[4] A cash sale is not, however, necessarily a conditional sale;[5] but although it is expressly for cash, or cash on delivery, payment of the price may or may not be a condition precedent to the transfer of title, according to the intention of the parties.[6] If by the use of such terms the parties understand merely that no credit is to be given and that the seller will insist upon his right to retain possession until payment is made, the contract is so far executed as to pass title to the buyer;[7] but if it is understood that the property in the goods is to remain in the seller until the price is paid no title passes until payment.[8] Even where the contract does not expressly provide as to the time of payment, if there is no provision for credit it will be presumed that the sale is for cash,[9] and that payment and delivery are to be concurrent,[10] so that until payment is made the buyer acquires no right to possession;[11] but whether payment is a condition precedent to the passing of title depends primarily upon the intention of the parties.[12] In some cases it has been held that since, where the time of payment is not stipulated, the sale is presumed to be for cash,[13] the general rule as to cash sales applies, and that the title does not pass until payment is made unless the condition is waived,[14] particularly if there has been no delivery.[15] Other cases, however, apply the general rule previously stated in regard to unconditional sales,[16] holding that, if the goods are specific and the contract is otherwise complete, the property, unless a contrary intention appears, passes at once,[17] subject to the seller's

Use of terms.— The expressions "cash," "cash down," or "cash on delivery," as used

lien,[18] so as to place the goods at the risk of the buyer,[19] although he is not entitled to possession until payment is made or tendered.[20] This rule does not apply, however, if there is any other condition to be performed or act done with reference to the thing sold, as for the purpose of identifying it, putting it in a deliverable state, or ascertaining the price.[21] Of course if by the contract payment of the price is a condition on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition is fulfilled.[22]

waived by the seller,[27] as by an unconditional delivery of the goods.[28] Unless a different intention appears, however, where the goods are to be paid for on delivery by bill, note, or other security it is generally held that this is a condition precedent to the transfer of the property,[29] and that unless the condition is waived the title will not pass until it is complied with, although there has been a delivery of the goods.[30]

e. Waiver of Payment — (i) In General. The condition as to payment or security is one which may be waived by the seller, in which case title to the goods sold will vest in the buyer, although the condition has not been performed.[31] Such condition will ordinarily be held to be waived by an unconditional delivery of the goods by the seller to the buyer without requiring payment or security,[32]

provided it is not procured by fraud,[33] even though the delivery is constructive,[34] or is made to a carrier.[35] The fact that there has been a delivery without requiring payment or security does not, however, necessarily constitute a waiver of such condition,[36] but merely creates a presumption to this effect,[37] which will not control if it otherwise appears that the delivery was not intended to be absolute but was merely conditional.[38] Whether the delivery is conditional or unconditional depends primarily upon the intention of the parties as shown by all the facts and circumstances of the case,[39] and so it is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury.[40] If the sale is for cash the mere acceptance of a check does not constitute an absolute payment or waiver of the condition as to payment.[41]

A check on a bank is not payment unless expressly so received, but is payment only when the money is received on it, and there is no presumption from the mere fact of tionally and without any intention of waiving payment or security the property does not pass;[42] and, in order to render a delivery conditional within the application of this rule, it is not necessary that there should be any express declaration to that effect,[43] but it is sufficient if it appears that such was the understanding of the parties,[44] or that the delivery was made in the expectation of immediate payment,[45] the question being primarily one of intention as shown by all the facts and circumstances of the case,[46] although a mere secret or undisclosed intention on the part of the seller is not of itself sufficient to make the delivery conditional.[47] So if the seller delivers on an understanding express or implied that he is to receive immediate payment or security he may reclaim the goods,[48] or if he delivers on payment by check in lieu of cash and the check is dishonored he may reclaim the property.[49]

(III) Delivery to Carrier. Where a delivery to a carrier is equivalent to a delivery to the buyer,[50] the condition as to payment or security may be waived by an unconditional delivery to the carrier;[51] but such condition is not waived if the delivery to the carrier is merely conditional,[52] as where the carrier is instructed not to deliver the goods unless payment is made.[53] The seller may also reserve the right of property in the goods, notwithstanding delivery by taking a bill of lading in such form as to indicate an intention to so reserve the right.[54] to pay the purchase-price will not vest title in the lender,[62] but the parties may by their contract provide that the title shall pass to the person making the advances as security therefor.[63]

(II) PART PAYMENT.[64] The effect of a part payment as regards the transfer of title depends primarily upon the terms of the contract and intention of the parties,[65] and also whether as between the parties anything still remains to be done with reference to the subject-matter of the sale.[66] So in some cases a part payment will as between the parties operate as a transfer of the right of property,[67] so as to place the goods at the risk of the buyer,[68] although not conferring any right of possession until the balance of the price is paid.[69] But the mere fact of a part payment does not necessarily have the effect of passing title;[70] and if the contract is not to be complete until the price is fully paid, a part payment does not give the buyer any title to the goods,[71] or even an interest therein to the extent of the payments made.[72] If, however, the contract expressly provides that title to the goods shall vest in the buyer as the same are paid for, he will acquire title to the extent of the payments made.[73]

(III) TENDER OF PAYMENT. If the property in the goods is to pass on payment of the price, a tender of the price by the buyer to the seller will operate to pass the property,[74] provided it is made in cash,[75] and is of the proper amount,[76] and if a valid tender has been made by the buyer and refused by the seller it is not necessary for the buyer to make a second tender.[77]

6. Reservation of Right of Property — a. In General.[78] Although the property in the goods will ordinarily pass on delivery,[79] yet it will not do so if the intention clearly appears on the part of the seller, to retain the jus disponendi or right of property,[80] using the term as distinguished from a mere reservation of a lien.[81] The right of property may be reserved by delivery in escrow to await payment,[82] or by delivery to a warehouseman taking the receipt in the name of the seller;[83] but the question usually arises on delivery to a carrier which as a general rule is a delivery to the buyer passing the property,[84] unless by the mode of shipment the right of property is reserved.[85]

b. Consignment to Seller or His Order. Where goods are shipped and by the bill of lading or shipping receipt are deliverable to the seller or his agent, or to the order of the seller or his agent, the seller thereby reserves the property in the goods,[86] even though the shipment is in care of the buyer.[87] But the evidence afforded by the mode of shipment as to the seller's intention is not conclusive,[88] and the property in the goods will be held to have passed to the buyer if such appears to have been the intention of the parties,[89] as for instance where the person who is apparently the seller is in fact the buyer's agent in the transaction,[90] or the goods are shipped for the account and at the risk of the buyer.[91] But on the other hand, even in such cases an intention that the property shall not pass may appear from other circumstances and should be given effect.[92]

e. Consignment to Buyer. If the goods are shipped in the name of the buyer as consignee or the bill of lading is indorsed to him this is strong evidence of an intent to pass the property free of any reservation.[93] But even in such cases the right of property may be reserved so that it will not pass to the buyer if the bill of lading stipulates for delivery to the seller, his agent or order,[94] or if the seller retains the bill of lading.[95]

d. Bill of Lading With Draft Attached. If where there is a consignment to the seller, his agent, or order, the bill of lading is forwarded to the seller's agent with draft attached to be delivered to the buyer on payment, the seller thereby manifests an intention to reserve the property in the goods,[96] and the property does not pass until the draft is paid.[97] And even when the buyer is named as consignee, if the bill of lading with draft attached is sent to the seller's agent or bank for collection the property in the goods is reserved and does not pass to the buyer until payment.[98] A different intention may, however, be indicated by the circumstances of the transaction and will of course control,[99] but an intention to pass the property will not be inferred from the delivery of an invoice to the buyer.[1] If the buyer obtains possession of the goods without payment of the draft, he does not thereby acquire any right of property;[2] but when the draft is paid by the buyer and the bill of lading delivered to him the property in the goods passes.[3] If the draft attached to the bill of lading is a time draft this imports a sale on credit and the bill should be delivered on acceptance of the draft,[4] unless there are instructions to hold until payment or circumstances indicating that the bill is to be held to secure both acceptance and payment;[5] but the bill should not be delivered until the draft is accepted.[6] The acceptance of the draft is a condition

precedent to the passing of title;[7] but upon its acceptance the title passes to the buyer,[8] unless it otherwise appears that it was not the intention to make a sale on credit, in which case the title will not pass upon acceptance but only when the draft is paid.[9]

e. Shipment C. O. D. There is a conflict of authority as to the effect of a shipment C. O. D.[10] In some cases it has been held that the property remains in the seller until payment has been made by the buyer,[11] the carrier being considered as the agent of the seller;[12] but in other cases it is held that where the shipment is C. O. D. the carrier is the agent of the buyer for the purpose of transportation,[13] and of the seller for the purpose of collection,[14] and that unless a contrary intention appears the property in the goods passes upon their delivery to the carrier,[15] although the buyer is not entitled to possession until payment is made,[16] and that the fact that the seller has prepaid the charges of transportation does not affect the rule.[17] The question has most frequently arisen in regard to sales of intoxicating liquors.[18]

In Texas the statute requires bills of sale in the case of sales of stock running on the range (Panhandle Nat. Bank v. Emery, 78 Tex. 498, 15 S. W. 23; Hickman v. Hickman, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 99, 27 S. narily remain in the seller until the bill of sale is given,[20] or the buyer takes possession,[21] but if the goods are delivered the title of the buyer will not be affected by the failure of the seller to make the bill of sale as agreed.[22] While the bill of sale takes effect from its delivery,[23] the delivery need not, in order to pass title, be made to the buyer, but may be made to some third person for him;[24] but there must be some delivery or act on the part of the seller showing an intention to deliver and make the instrument effective,[25] particularly as against third persons.[26] Generally on the execution and delivery of a bill of sale the property in the goods passes from the seller to the buyer,[27] and entitles the latter to the immediate possession,[28] provided the instrument evidences a present sale,[29] properly identifies the effect of not taking a bill of sale is to make the possession prima facie illegal. It is not conclusively so and the title will pass without the bill of sale if it is shown that the sale was bona fide and for a sufficient consideration, and that no evasion of the law was intended (Colorado First Nat. In Colorado, under a statute making sales, unless accompanied by delivery and change of possession, fraudulent and void as to creditors, it is held that where one takes a bill of sale of goods without taking possession of the goods, a subsequent mortgage of the same goods by the seller gives the mortgagee a superior lien on the goods, although he knew of the bill of sale when the mortgage was given. Allen v. Steiger, 17 Colo. 552, 31 Pac. 226.

Priorities.— Where different persons claim the same goods by conveyances equally valid, he who first acquires the possession has the better title (Jewett v. Lincoln, 14 Me. 116, 31 Am. Dec. 36); provided the second buyer is without notice of the first sale (Winslow v. Leonard, 24 Pa. St. 14, 62 Am. Dec. 354).

sale should be filed or recorded.[38] In some states, however, it is provided by statute that in order to pass the property as against creditors and subsequent purchasers where possession is retained by the seller, the bill of sale must be filed or recorded.[39] But such a statute does not apply where the property is in the possession of a person not the seller,[40] where there is a delivery and change of possession,[41] or where the subsequent purchaser has actual notice of the sale.[42]

8. Reconveyance to Seller — a. In General. The property in the goods may be revested in the seller by a rescission of the contract,[43] by a return of the goods

In Texas the statute requires sales of stock running upon the range by the sale and delivery of the brands and marks to be by a bill of sale duly recorded (Rankin v. Bell, 85 Tex. 28, 19 S. W. 874; Panhandle Nat. Bank v. Emery, 78 Tex. 498, 15 S. W. 23; Black v. Vaughan, 70 Tex. 47, 7 S. App. 242, 26 S. W. 462; Nance v. Barber, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 26 S. W. 151); nor does it apply to cattle outside of the state (Ft. Worth Nat. Bank v. Daugherty, 81 Tex. 301, 16 S. W. 1028), or to cases where the sale is accompanied by a delivery to the buyer (Colorado First Nat. Bank v. Brown, 85 Tex. 80, 23 S. W. 862; Rainwater-Boogher Hat Co. v. O'Neal, supra; Boutwell v. Hiltpold, (Tex. App. 1890) 15 S. W. 501), although the cattle are afterward returned to the range (Boutwell v. Hiltpold, supra), provided the intention is to convey only the stock and not the brand (Rainwater-Boogher Hat Co. v. O'Neal, supra). If the bill of sale is duly recorded the title passes without delivery of the stock. Dallas Nat. Bank v. Davis, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 36 S. W. 144.

Record as notice.— Since a bill of sale is not required by law to be recorded a record of it is not notice to creditors of the seller. Janelle v. Denoncour, 68 N. H. 1, 44 Atl. 63. But see McCall v. Lewis, 1 Strobh. (S. C.) 442.

Exempt property.— A bill of sale is valid as between the parties, although it is not recorded, and if the property sold is exempt property of the seller it is also valid as to creditors. Heisch v. Bell, 11 N. M. 523, 70 Pac. 572.

Who may record.— A vendor of personal property may act as the agent of the vendee in filing the bill of sale for record and managing the property for him. Thomas v. Hillhouse, 17 Iowa 67. So also a parish judge may record his own bill of sale which will then be valid as against third persons. Tessier v. Hall, 7 Mart. (La.) 411.

Effect of recording.— The execution of the bill of sale and its acknowledgment and recording vests in the buyer the same interest as in the case of a sale accompanied by a transfer of possession. Clary v. Frayer, 8 Gill & J. (Md.) 398; Hambleton v. Hayward, 4 Harr. & J. (Md.) 443.

Effect of delay in recording.— A failure to record a bill of sale within ten days after its execution, as required by statute, renders it void only as to such persons as have obtained intervening rights after its execution and before it was filed for record, and not as to creditors who became such after it was recorded. Modification of contract.— After a verbal sale of chattels has been consummated by delivery, neither a subsequent change in the mode of payment, nor the subsequent acceptance of a bill of sale operates as a divesunder a contract of sale or return,[44] by a substitution of other goods for those originally sold,[45] by breach of conditions on which title depends,[46] or by repurchase.[47]

b. Agreements For Repurchase and Reconveyance. The contract of sale may provide for a repurchase by and reconveyance to the seller.[48] Such agreements are valid and will be enforced,[49] provided the conditions upon which such repurchase is to be made are complied with,[50] and on the consummation thereof the property in the goods will immediately revest in the seller,[51] even as against the creditors of the buyer.[52] The reconveyance must be with the knowledge and titure of the title. Sanders v. Stokes, 30 Ala. 432. Where a machine is sold through an agent who receives in part payment a note payable in two and one-half months, a subsequent written agreement under which the seller returns the note and which recites that the purchaser agrees to pay for the use of the machine a certain sum per month, or in default thereof to return it, the amounts so paid to be deducted from the purchase-price if the purchaser buys the machine, does not operate to transfer the title back to the seller. Performance of conditions by seller.— Where the contract provides that in case of the non-performance of certain conditions the seller shall return the purchase-price received by him and that the goods shall then become again his sole property, the title does not revest in him upon the non-performance of the other conditions until he has returned the purchase-price. Heald v. Macgowan, 14 N. Y. Suppl. 280 [affirmed in 128 N. Y. 612, 28 N. E. 252].

Agreement not constituting condition.— On a sale of corporate stock made in part consideration of a promise that the corporation would not set up any claim against the seller on account of past transactions, such promise is not a condition on which title depends so that on suit brought by the corporation the title to the stock would revert to the seller. Sale or security.— A written agreement, whereby the owner of goods agreed to hold the same as consignee of the firm to whom he was indebted for part payment of the price thereof, and to pay over the proceeds thereof as they were sold, did not vest title thereto in said firm, where it did not appear that the debt was thereby extinguished, nor that there was any payment or agreement by said firm to pay for said goods, nor that any inventory was taken thereof, and it was shown that the valuation placed on the goods by the debtor was in excess of the actual value thereof, and that the creditor accepted the instrument as security for the payment of the debt. Transfer of title.— A sale with a collateral agreement to repurchase, if merely colorable and for the purpose of enabling the selling corporation to make a certain report as to the character of its assets, does not constitute a transfer in law of the title. People v. Corrigan, 195 N. Y. 1, 87 N. E. 792 [reversing 129 N. Y. App. Div. 62, 113 N. Y. Suppl. 504].

assent of the seller,[53] and must usually be attended by the same formalities as an original sale as to delivery or payment.[54] As against creditors and subsequent purchasers there must ordinarily be an actual redelivery of the goods and change of possession,[55] unless such creditors or purchasers have notice of the resale;[56] but in the application of this rule regard must be had to the nature and situation of the property and other circumstances of the case, and an actual manual delivery is not in all cases essential.[57] It is a sufficient redelivery as against creditors and subsequent purchasers if there is a delivery to a warehouseman, subject to the order of the original seller,[58] or even where the original buyer retains possession, if he does so under an agreement to hold as bailee of the original seller,[59] or as his agent for the purpose of selling the goods.[60]

9. Rights and Liabilities of Parties — a. Title and Right of Buyer — (i) In General. A purchaser of goods can acquire only the rights of his vendor.[61] Consequently a purchaser of goods acquires no property therein as against the true owner, if they were stolen,[62] or are sold by one who, although in possession,

Failure to reclaim goods.— Where goods sold are actually delivered to the purchaser, notice by him, given fifteen days later, that he will not accept them, does not reinvest the seller with the title, as against the purchaser's creditors, in the absence of any steps by the seller to reclaim them until after their seizure on attachment as the property of the purchaser. Possession as evidence of ownership.— While possession is prima facie evidence of ownership of every species of personal property, yet he who deals with such possession upon the mere evidence which possession affords takes upon himself the risk that there is another and true owner. Moore v. Robinson, 62 Ala. 537.

Estoppel of owner.— Where one has wrongfully taken the property of another and sold it, not as agent, but on his own account, mere silence upon the part of the owner does not confirm the sale. The confirmation must rest upon some consideration upholding it, or upon an estoppel. The owner, upon discovery of the wrong, is not required to make immediate efforts to regain his property, and silence, short of the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, will not bar his claim. Hamlin v. Sears, 82 N. Y. 327.

Possession by wrong-doer.— The conversion of chattels does not pass the title to the wrong-doer, and before judgment obtained for their value the owner may pass the title to a third person. Howe v. Johnson, 117 Cal. 37, 48 Pac. 978.

Unrecorded loan.— Under a Kentucky statute it has been held that a purchaser of property which has been held by the seller for five years under an unrecorded loan acquires a good title thereto provided the sale is absolute and not merely conditional. Gaines v. Wiggs, 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 282.

64. See Moore v. Robinson, 62 Ala. 537.

Sale by agent.— Although the goods are rightfully in possession of an agent of the owner, a sale made by the agent without authority to do so conveys no title unless ratified by the owner. Moore v. Robinson, 62 Ala. 537. A statute providing that an agent not having the documentary evidence of title, who shall be intrusted with possession of any merchandise for sale, shall be deemed the true owner, so as to give validity to any contract for the sale or disposition thereof for any money advanced, or negotiable instrument or other obligation in writing given, by such other person on the faith thereof, does not apply where a person intrusted with merchandise simply as an agent for the sale thereof disposes of it by barter. is liable to the true owner for the value of the goods.[65] Unless the buyer occupies the position of a bona fide purchaser he takes the goods subject to any valid liens existing thereon.[66]

(II) PRIORITIES. As a general rule between purchasers of personal property the elder title will in the absence of fraud prevail;[67] but under the rule requiring an actual delivery and change of possession as against subsequent purchasers,[68] it is held that where the same goods are sold to different buyers and the sales are otherwise equally valid, the buyer who first lawfully acquires the possession has the better title,[69] provided the second buyer is without notice of the first sale.[70]

Lien of bailee.— Where the goods are in possession of a bailee of the vendor, a bill of sale entitles the purchaser to demand the possession of the property of the bailee at once; and, if the latter claims a lien upon the property, it is his duty to make a positive claim, if not to state its nature and amount, and, failing so to do, his refusal to deliver the property amounts to a conversion. Goods in custodia legis.— The assent of the sheriff to the sale by defendant of goods levied upon by execution will not divest the title of a purchaser under a previous sale made by defendant. Frost v. Hill, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 386.

Where different bills of lading are given to different persons, the question as to the transfer of the property does not depend upon the mere priority of signing the bills of lading, but upon the one on whose account the goods were delivered by the seller. Stevens v. Boston, etc., R. Corp., 8 Gray (Mass.) 262.

First sale incomplete.—Where a contract of sale is made but the buyer is not entitled to possession until the price is paid and before there has been any payment or delivery the goods are sold to a second buyer, who makes full payment and receives the goods without notice of the first sale, the latter acquires a good title to the goods. Miller v. Cushman, 38 Vt. 593.

Right of first buyer to purchase-money notes.— Where the owner of land deeds the fee to his nephew, reserving a life-estate, and sells all his personalty on the place to the nephew, but possession remains with him, and is not taken by the buyer until after his death and the seller has disposed of some of the property, taking notes therefor in his name, in the absence of evidence that the buyer had reconveyed the property to the seller, or that he had any notice or reason to suspect that the latter claimed it in hostility to his title, the notes belong to the buyer. not occupy the position of bona fide purchaser [71] takes only the title of the buyer.[72] He cannot hold the original seller for fraud or misrepresentation in the sale unless they were practised on him also; [73] and on the other hand the seller cannot impose conditions on the sale, which will run with the goods and be binding on subsequent purchasers from the buyer, although they have notice thereof.[74]

b. Risk of Loss or Injury — (I) In General. In the absence of statute or agreement the risk of loss or injury as between the buyer and the seller depends upon which party has title to the goods at the time such loss or injury occurs,[75] and so if the title has passed the risk will be upon the buyer, although he may not at the time be entitled to the possession; [78] but an absolute and unqualified obligation assumed by the seller to deliver the goods may place the risk upon him until delivery, irrespective of the question of the passing of title.[77] As a rule under a merely executory contract the risk of loss of or injury to the goods is on the seller.[78] Consequently the risk is on the seller if anything remains to be done to complete the sale, as counting, weighing, or measuring to determine the quantity or price,[79] or the goods are to be selected and identified; [80] but this risk may be assumed by the buyer,[81] or imposed on him by statute.[82]

are ordinarily at the risk of the seller;[83] but the intent of the parties will govern, and if such intention appears the risk may be on the buyer even before delivery.[84] So too if the sale by its terms is complete without delivery the risk of loss is on the buyer before delivery,[85] notwithstanding something remains to be done to ascertain the amount due.[86] If delivery is prevented by the failure of the buyer to furnish transportation facilities as he agreed to do he and not the seller must bear the loss of the goods.[87]

the seller in relation to the goods.[91] So too the goods are at the risk of the buyer after a valid tender and refusal to accept,[92] or if the goods are placed at his disposal with access for the purpose of removal.[93] But the tender or delivery must be one that the buyer is bound to accept,[94] and if there is a tender or delivery of a quantity greater than the contract calls for the buyer is not liable for the loss or injury to the goods.[95] If after delivery the seller retains possession of the property by permission of the buyer or under an agreement to take care of the property for a certain time, he is bound to exercise only the care of a reasonably prudent man,[96] and is not responsible for a loss not due to his lack of care.[97]

Notice before full payment.— If the purchaser has notice before the transaction is chaser he must have been without notice not only at the time of the contract but also at the time of the payment of the purchase-money; [10] but notice acquired only after payment will not affect the title of the purchaser.[11]

(II) WHAT CONSTITUTES NOTICE — (A) In General. Notice within the application of the rule above stated [12] is not synonymous with and need not necessarily amount to actual knowledge.[13] The notice may be either actual or constructive,[14] and a knowledge of facts sufficient to put the buyer upon inquiry is equivalent to notice of such facts as the inquiry would have disclosed; [15] but notice to be implied must have knowledge as its source and basis,[16] and the mere existence of facts and circumstances sufficient to put the buyer on inquiry but from which notice cannot be conclusively presumed is not sufficient in the absence of any information or knowledge of such facts and circumstances.[17] So the fact that certain matters are of common repute in the community is not alone sufficient to charge the buyer with notice of such facts.[18] The notice must also be sufficiently definite to charge the buyer with knowledge of the existence of some defect of title or claim against the property.[19] It is not sufficient that some third person has expressed to the buyer a mere opinion or suspicion, without any facts to justify it, adverse to the character of the seller,[20] or the validity of his title to the goods;[21] nor is a friendly intimacy between the buyer and seller sufficient to charge the former with knowledge of the latter's financial affairs.[22] Even actual notice once given is not necessarily good forever, and a person may be a bona fide purchaser if at the time of the sale he has forgotten the existence of such notice.[23]

Co. v. Turner, 84 Ala. 523, 4 So. 658. So, although the buyer has given his check for the purchase-price, but with the understanding that it is not to be paid at once, and instructs his banker to withhold payment until further orders, and the check is not negotiated, its payment upon direction of the buyer, given after notice of a defect of title, will not make him a bona fide purchaser. Where land is leased for the purpose of being cleared and prepared for cultivation, the tenant having the right to dispose of timber cut on parts of the land which he is clearing, a provision in the lease limiting this right of the tenant to such parts of the land as are being cleared and prepared for cultivation is not sufficient to charge purchasers of the timber with knowledge of the wrongful act of the tenant in cutting the timber from other parts of the land. Cramer v. Groseclose, 53 Mo. App. 648.

On a sale of growing timber by a landowner who takes back a mortgage from the buyer which is not recorded, the constructive possession of the seller as owner of the land is not notice of his claim to the timber as to one purchasing from his vendee upon the faith of his bill of sale. So also notice of claims of one kind or character will not amount to notice of claims of another kind.[24]

(B) Actual or Constructive Notice. It is not essential that the purchaser should have actual notice of defects in the title,[25] but such notice may be constructive,[26] as by the registration of the instrument affecting the title,[27] by knowledge of facts sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry,[28] or by notice to some person standing in such relation to the buyer that the notice is equivalent to notice to the buyer.[29] So notice to the purchaser will be implied from notice to his agent,[30] where it results from the transaction in which the agent is acting for his principal.[31]

(C) Facts Putting Purchaser on Inquiry. Knowledge on the part of the purchaser of facts and circumstances which ought reasonably to excite suspicion and put him on inquiry is sufficient to charge him with notice of facts that he might have ascertained by the exercise of ordinary diligence.[32] Thus a purchaser

tion for the jury, considering the length of time since the notice was given, its particularity, and the other circumstances of the case.

with knowledge that the seller is a tenant is chargeable with notice of the landlord's lien for rent,[33] and a purchaser of goods shipped by carrier is also bound to make inquiry as to the bills of lading,[34] and is charged with notice of facts as to the state of the title shown by such documents.[35] Inadequacy of price is also an element to be considered in determining whether the purchase was in good faith and without notice,[36] particularly where the purchase is made out of the usual course of trade or there are other suspicious circumstances connected with the transaction.[37] A purchaser is not, however, chargeable with notice of a fact, although a reasonable inquiry on his part would disclose its existence, unless the law casts upon him the duty of making such inquiry,[38] and this duty exists only when he has knowledge of facts sufficient to excite such inquiry or which would naturally and reasonably be calculated to awaken a suspicion of the existence of the main fact with notice of which he is sought to be charged.[39] No general rule can well be laid down as to what will or will not be sufficient to put the buyer upon inquiry in any particular case,[40] but the facts and circumstances must be sufficient to arouse the suspicion of an ordinarily prudent person,[41] and the buyer is chargeable with notice only of such facts as by the use of ordinary care and diligence he would probably have discovered.[42] The true rule with respect to notice has been said to be that the circumstances must be such as not only lead

Question for jury.— Whether the facts and circumstances are sufficient to put the buyer upon inquiry is ordinarily a question for the jury. Kops Bros. Co. v. Smith, 137 Mich. 28, 100 N. W. 169; Pinkerton Bros. Co. v. Bromley, 119 Mich. 8, 77 N. W. 307; Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 157.

Minnesota.— Cochran v. Stewart, 21 Minn. 435.

New York.— Birdsall v. Russell, 29 N. Y. 220.

A mere doubt irrespective of how vague or unreasonable it may be is not necessarily sufficient to put the buyer on inquiry (Hoyt, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Turner, 84 Ala. 523, 4 So. 658); but a suspicion as to the existence of a fact may be sufficient to put a person on inquiry as to its existence, although he does not fully believe in its existence (Kyle v. Ward, 81 Ala. 120, 1 So. 468).

42. Cochran v. Stewart, 21 Minn. 435.

to but direct the course of inquiry which if pursued will end in the discovery of the facts with notice of which the buyer is to be charged.[43] If, however, the facts and circumstances are such as to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry, it is the duty of the buyer to make such inquiry,[44] and if he fails or refuses to do so he must take the consequences as if he had received actual notice;[45] but if where the buyer's suspicions are aroused he makes a proper inquiry and is in good faith satisfied as to the state of the title, he should be regarded as a bona fide purchaser.[46]

(D) Filing and Registration. If the instrument affecting the title of the seller is duly filed and recorded the record is constructive notice to the purchaser,[47] provided it is filed in the proper office,[48] and if recorded within the time prescribed by the statute it is constructive notice even to purchasers between the date of execution and the date of registration.[49] If, however, such an instrument is not required to be recorded the record thereof will not constitute constructive notice;[50]

43. Engel v. Salomon, 41 Ill. App. 411; Birdsall v. Russell, 29 N. Y. 220. But see Hines v. Perry, 25 Tex. 443, holding that an instruction that "the information necessary to constitute notice must point out the records or persons from whom the title . . . could be ascertained, or it will not be sufficient to constitute notice," is too stringent as to the degree of definiteness required.

Although something is omitted by the buyer which an ordinarily prudent person would have done, he is not charged with notice of facts which the act omitted if done would not have revealed. Cochran v. Stewart, 21 Minn. 435.

The mere expression of a suspicion by a third person to the buyer as to the validity of the seller's title, without any facts stated to justify such suspicion, does not impose upon the buyer the duty of interrupting his regular business and running about the country to see if it is well or ill founded. Gosney v. Frost, 27 Ill. 53.

Notice of the insolvency of the seller is not alone sufficient to put the buyer upon inquiry as to whether the seller is making the sale in order to defraud his creditors where the buyer has no notice of such intention. State v. Merritt, 70 Mo. 275.

Knowledge that the seller is transferring his goods with intent to defraud his creditors is not alone sufficient to charge the buyer with notice that the seller procured the goods fraudulently. Engel v. Salomon, 41 Ill. App. 411.

Knowledge of non-payment.— Where an unexecuted agreement has been made for the sale of goods, and the goods remain in possession of the vendor, one who buys from the vendee with notice that he has not paid for the goods is put on inquiry to ascertain whether the first vendee is entitled to the goods without payment on delivery. while on the other hand the fact that the instrument should have been, but was not, recorded does not entitle one to the protection of a bona fide purchaser if he had actual notice of such instrument.[51]

(E) Judicial Records and Proceedings. Notice of judgments and other records of the courts is implied,[52] as well as notice of the facts that might be disclosed by inquiry based on knowledge of the pendency of a suit affecting the title,[53] or the fact that an attachment has been levied upon the goods sold.[54]

d. Consideration — (I) In General. To constitute one a bona fide purchaser and entitle him to protection as such, he must have purchased not only without notice of defects in the title,[55] but also for a valuable consideration,[56] and he cannot be considered as a bona fide purchaser until he has actually paid the purchase-price,[57] or become irrevocably bound for its payment.[58]

(II) Payment of Value — (A) In General. To constitute a valuable consideration within the application of the above rule it is necessary that the purchaser should part with something of value,[59] incur some new obligation,[60]

Compare McCall v. Lewis, 1 Strobh. (S. C.) 442.

In Virginia, Code (1887), §§ 2463, 2464, and 2465 do not authorize the recordation of any contracts for the sale of personal property except those made in consideration of marriage, and except in such cases the record is not notice to subsequent purchasers for value. Application of rule.— A purchaser of goods who agrees with the seller to pay the price relinquish some security,[61] or do some act on the faith of the purchase which cannot be retracted,[62] and which would leave the buyer in a worse position if his purchase should be set aside,[63] a mere agreement by the buyer which he can avoid in case his title proves defective being insufficient.[64] It is not, however, necessary that the consideration should be paid in money,[65] or that it should be paid directly to the seller.[66] The consideration paid should be fair and such as would not excite surprise or suspicion,[67] and while it is not necessary that it should be for the full value of the property,[68] yet where the consideration is inadequate and the transaction is not in the usual course of business, or there are other suspicious circumstances sufficient to put the buyer on notice, he cannot claim protection as a bona fide purchaser.[69]

(B) Payment by Note. One who makes payment by note is not a bona fide purchaser unless the note is negotiable,[70] and even where a negotiable note is given for the purchase-price it must have been paid or assigned to an innocent holder before notice;[71] but if the note given in payment has been negotiated before notice the buyer is a bona fide purchaser.[72]

(C) Purchase on Credit. To constitute one a bona fide purchaser the payment of the consideration must be made at the time of purchase,[73] and conse-

on notes given by the latter to third persons on which the purchaser is already liable as indorser incurs no new obligation and is not a purchaser who has paid the price. Hoyt, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Turner, 84 Ala. 523, 4 So. 658. A promise by a surety to the principal to pay the debt as consideration for chattels sold to him by the principal does not change his relation to the creditor and so does not make him a purchaser for value. quently if the goods are bought on credit the buyer cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser.[74]

(D) Preëxisting Debt. Where the goods are taken in payment of a preëxisting debt the rule in most jurisdictions is that this is not a valuable consideration and the purchaser is not to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser,[75] but in some jurisdictions the contrary rule prevails,[76] provided there is an actual satisfaction of the indebtedness.[77] It has also been held that if the purchaser surrenders a valuable

Ratification.— The fact that an owner of property sold without authority by a third person to a bona fide purchaser makes no demand for its return, and neither informs him of his claim as owner, nor commences replevin, for nine weeks after learning of the sale, does not amount to a ratification of the sale. Harrison v. Clark, 74 Conn. 18, 49 Atl. 186.

Mortgagor in possession.—Where A makes a bill of sale of a horse to B, acknowledging the receipt of payment by two notes and at the same time takes back a writing stating the purchase of the horse, and that it is to remain the property of A until the notes become due, the transaction is merely a contract of sale or a sale and a mortgage back, and in either case A is entitled to the horse on a failure of payment of the notes as against a bona fide purchaser from B without notice before the notes became due. Lane v. Borland, 14 Me. 77, 31 Am. Dec. 33.

Possession by public officer.— The possession of goods by a public officer does not carry with it such indicia of title or authority to sell as will protect a bona fide purchaser. Johnson v. Frishie, 29 Md. 76, 96 Am. Dec. 508; Quinton v. Cutlip, 1 Okla. 302, 32 Pac. 269.

d. Purchase in Market Overt.[10] In England protection is extended to purchasers in market overt in a limited class of retail transactions, and all shops in London are markets overt for the purpose of their own trade,[11] but outside of the city markets overt exist only by grant or prescription.[12] By a purchase in market overt the title obtained is good against all the world.[13] To constitute a sale in market overt the whole transaction must take place and the sale be completed within the open market.[14] It is not absolutely essential that the interior of the room where the transaction takes place shall be visible from the outside,[15] but the sale must be open, and a sale in a show-room of a shop to which access can be had only by special permission is not within the exception.[16] The custom of markets overt does not exist in the United States,[17] and consequently the rule of

Joint tenants of safety deposit box.— The rule that where one of two innocent persons must suffer through the fraud of a third person, he must bear the loss who placed it in the power of the third person to commit the fraud, does not apply to the case of two persons having a safety deposit box in common, and one of them, without authority, abstracting therefrom, and transferring to an innocent purchaser for value, a certificate of stock indorsed in blank belonging to the other. caveat emptor applies without distinction to all sales which are otherwise within the application of such rule.[18]

e. Effect of Delivery. As a delivery of goods is usually effective to pass the title to the buyer,[19] a bona fide purchaser from one upon whom apparent ownership has been conferred by delivery will be protected,[20] even where the original purchase-price has not been paid.[21] In some cases it has been held that a delivery to the buyer will pass title so as to protect an innocent purchaser, irrespective of the terms of the contract or intention of the parties;[22] but in other cases it is held that the rule does not apply if the passing of title is conditional upon payment,[23] or there is a reservation of the property in the goods,[24] the decisions being based on the ground that a person without title can convey none.[25]

f. Misrepresentation and Fraud. Where the original sale was induced by fraud and misrepresentation the original seller cannot unless he has disaffirmed the sale recover the goods from a subsequent bona fide purchaser.[26] This rule is based

Property Procured by Wrongful or Felonious Acts. A bona fide purchaser is not protected as against the claim of the true owner where the seller has obtained possession of the property by wrongful acts,[36] if without any delivery by or consent on the part of the owner,[37] as where the goods were obtained by means of a trespass.[38] The rule has also been laid down that a bona fide purchaser is not protected where his vendor obtained the goods by means of a felony;[39] but it has been held that the act must have been a felony at common law,[40] and that a bona fide purchaser will be protected where his vendor acquired the goods by fraudulent owner has conferred upon such bailee authority to sell the goods a sale made pursuant to such authority will convey a good title to the buyer.[48]

j. Purchase From Trustee. A bona fide purchaser of trust property from the trustee without notice of the trust will be protected.[49]

k. Purchase From Agent.[50] The mere possession of property by one, although as agent of the owner, is not sufficient to enable him to pass title as against the owner by a sale of the property even to a bona fide purchaser;[51] and where property is delivered to a private agent to be sold for the benefit of the owner, a sale by the agent to his own creditor in payment of his own debt will not divest the title of the owner, although the sale is to a bona fide purchaser;[52] but the protection given to bona fide purchasers extends to purchasers from an agent who has not only the possession but has also been clothed with an apparent ownership and authority to sell.[53] So also where the agent has been authorized to sell, the title of a bona fide purchaser is not affected by the fact that the agent's authority has been revoked if the sale is made and the property delivered before notice of such revocation,[54] or by the fact that the power of attorney under which the sale was made was procured by fraud;[55] nor is the title of a bona fide purchaser affected by the fact that the agent subsequently embezzles the purchase-money,[56] or that by reason of his fraud or misconduct the owner of the property fails to receive the proceeds of the sale.[57]

unless such purchaser was a former purchaser with notice, of the same property prior to its sale to the bona fide purchaser.[59]

m. Bona Fide Purchase From Purchaser With Notice. While it has been held that a bona fide purchaser without notice from a purchaser with notice is not affected by such notice,[60] yet under some circumstances the original purchaser with notice acquires no title and can convey none even to an innocent purchaser without notice.[61]

3. Actions — a. In General. As a general rule the owner of property which has been wrongfully taken and sold to a bona fide purchaser cannot maintain an action against the latter to recover its possession until after he has made a demand for its return.[62]

b. Pleading. In an action against one who relies upon the defense of being a bona fide purchaser, he must not only allege the purchase and a bona fide payment of the consideration with circumstantiality of details,[63] but he must positively deny notice,[64] or knowledge of any facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry,[65] not only at the time of the contract but down to and at the time of the payment of the purchase-money,[66] and must positively aver that such payment has been made.[67]

c. Evidence — (i) Burden of Proof. As a general rule the burden is upon one claiming to be a bona fide purchaser to establish this fact.[68] In some cases, however, it has been held that while the burden is upon such purchaser to show in the first instance that his purchase was for value,[69] if this is shown the burden of proof then shifts,[70] and that the burden is then upon the adverse party to show that the purchase was with notice.[71]

(II) ADMISSIBILITY. Upon the issue as to whether a particular purchase was bona fide the evidence to be admissible must be relevant to such issue,[72] but any evidence otherwise competent is admissible which tends to prove or disprove the bona fides of the transaction.[73] Evidence of other separate and distinct transactions between the parties is not admissible on the issue of good faith in the purchase in question,[74] and evidence of the insolvency of the original purchaser, not shown to have come to the knowledge or notice of the subpurchaser, is incompetent.[75] It may, however, be shown that the original purchase was made with intent not to pay,[76] and that on the resale it was attempted to keep the vendor's creditors in ignorance thereof, such evidence being relevant on the issue of good faith.[77]

2. Executed or Executory Contracts. While there can be no effective warranty, no warranty that will serve as the basis of an action unless there is a completed sale,[86] this does not mean that there can be no warranty in an executory sale. It is entirely competent for the vendor in an executory contract to make an absolute warranty,[87] and in some classes of executory contracts warranties will always be implied.[88] Although ordinarily a warranty of quality does not survive inspection and acceptance of the goods,[89] if the seller intends to extend the warranty beyond delivery and make himself responsible if the goods are not as represented, and the other party so understands the contract he is bound.[90] But if the buyer rejects the article because not corresponding to the terms of an executory contract he may have an action for failure to deliver but not on the warranty.[91] On the other hand if the buyer retains and uses the article he may have his remedy on the warranty.[92] The distinction rests not on the fact that the contract was in its inception executory or executed but on the fact whether the contract becomes an executed sale.[93]

3. Distinguished From Other Grounds of Liability — a. In General. A distinction must be observed between warranties and other grounds of liability, such as independent agreements for repairs,[94] or for indemnity against claims of prospective purchasers from the buyer,[95] or options to return the goods if not satisfactory.[96]

b. Non-Performance. A distinction is also to be noted between warranty and the liability for mere non-performance. Thus where the contract is for the sale of a designated article and another is delivered, there is no warranty to sell the article designated on which a right of action can be based but the remedy is for non-performance,[97] and where the contract is for the delivery of goods of a

Quantity sold.—Where plaintiff alleges the sale of a certain quantity of hay, being the balance of a stack after reserving a part, and defendants produce evidence that they bought only so much of the balance as might be good hay, and that they received only one load, the hay not being good, the question is not one of warranty, but how much was sold. Taylor v. Ballard, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 884.

Nature of relief.—Although the rights of parties who buy under an express or implied warranty as to the thing sold differ somewhat in reference to the remedy from those who contract for one thing and receive another, where the article received has been consumed in testing it, and rescission is impracticable or impossible, the relief is the same whether the action be on the warranty certain quality, but the particular article to be delivered is not ascertained, there is no warranty that the goods when delivered shall be of the quality mentioned, and the failure to deliver goods of such quality is not a breach of warranty but a breach of the contract.[98]

c. Conditions. Warranties are to be distinguished from stipulations in the nature of conditions,[99] in that conditions are statements or premises forming the basis of the contract on a breach of which the parties may treat the contract as at an end,[1] whereas a warranty is collateral to the contract and a breach thereof does not terminate the contract but gives only an action for damages.[2]

d. Misrepresentations and Fraud. There is a definite distinction between representation and warranty, although it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a given statement is the one or the other. A representation is an antecedent statement made as an inducement to the contract but not a part of or an element in the contract,[3] whereas a warranty becomes by agreement a part of the contract.[4] The untruthfulness of a representation unless material or fraudulent will not affect the contract.[5] On the other hand, in the case of a warranty it is immaterial whether the seller knew his statements were untrue or not.[6] A statement is none the less a warranty because it is false and fraudulent.[7] In Agreement to sell.—A covenant to assign a chattel in as full a manner as A had assigned it to the covenantor does not bind the covenantor to insert a covenant of warranty in such assignment. Morrill v. Worthington, 14 Mass. 389.

bank collecting a draft with bill of lading attached does not become liable on a warranty as to the quality of the goods.[12] An officer may be liable on an express warranty made by him on a public sale.[13] And a personal representative in making sale of the effects of a deceased person may bind himself by a warranty.[14] A joint owner is, however, not bound by the warranty of his coöwner unless he expressly authorized the warranty.[15] Neither is a pledgee to whom the price is paid liable on an implied warranty on a sale by the owner.[16]

b. Persons Who May Rely on Warranty. Ordinarily a warranty is addressed to some particular person,[17] and the buyer alone can avail himself thereof.[18] A warranty on the sale of personalty does not run with the property,[19] and assignees of or purchasers from the buyer cannot avail themselves thereof as against the original seller,[20] unless the assignee or purchaser assumes payment of the original purchase-price,[21] or the warranty is specifically assigned to the second purchaser,[22] or by a usage of the trade a warranty inures to the benefit of subsequent purchasers.[23]

6. Consideration. While no separate consideration is necessary to support a warranty made at the time and as a part of the transaction of sale,[24] a warranty made after the contract of sale is completed is inoperative unless there is a new consideration to support it,[25] the original consideration being exhausted by the transfer of the property in the goods without warranty.[26] But a new consideration is not necessary if the warranty is inserted in the contract merely to make it conform to the original agreement,[27] or to support a written warranty executed subsequent to the transfer of the property in compliance with the parol agreement made at the time of the sale.[28] Where by mutual agreement the contract is modified by including a warranty therein as an inducement to the buyer to complete the contract in accordance with prior negotiations, the warranty is supported by a sufficient consideration.[29] But if the sale is already complete so as to pass the property in the goods, modification by including a warranty merely to influence the buyer to perform is not based on a new consideration.[30] A modification of the warranty before acceptance of the goods does not require a new consideration.[31]

C. Express Warranties — 1. In General. An express warranty may be oral or in writing,[32] and may be made directly or through the medium of another.[33] It may be in the form of a printed general warranty [34] on the back of the order for goods,[35] and over the printed signature of the seller,[36] and if relied on by the purchaser to the knowledge of the seller is valid, although not countersigned by the seller's agent as specified in the printed conditions.[37] A warranty may also be contained in a letter [38] properly referred to and made a part of the contract.[39] On a subsequent sale an assignment of the bill of sale does not necessarily constitute a warranty by the assignor,[40] unless the conditions of the sale are specifically referred to in the indorsement.[41] A warranty, like any other contract, is voidable if induced by misrepresentation on the part of the buyer whether fraudulent or not [42] or by mistake.[43]

2. Warranty as Part of the Contract. To constitute an express warranty the statement made must be part of the contract.[44] It must be part of the negotiations of the contract,[45] and be included therein when the agreement is finally

Edgar v. Joseph Breck, etc., Corp., 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083.

Revocation of warranty.— In an action for breach of warranty of a cow sold at public auction, a charge that if the jury found that while bids were being taken defendant was asked, in plaintiff's presence, if he would warrant the cow in certain particulars, and that he replied that he would warrant nothing, it would revoke a warranty prior thereto, was properly refused. To have such effect, the statement must be made in plaintiff's hearing, as well as in his presence. Bronson v. Leach, 74 Mich. 713, 42 N. W. 174.

Substitution.—Where a band cutter and feeder was sold under a warranty, and thereafter the seller and purchaser entered into an agreement that, if the feeder would not work, a feeder of another description should be substituted, the latter contract was in addition to the original contract of warranty, and not a substitute therefor, which would prevent an action on the original warranty. form of words is essential,[52] and it is not necessary that the word "warrant" should be used.[53] The word "warrant" is not so technical that it may not be supplied by others. It is enough if the words used are not dubious or equivocal, and if it appears from the whole evidence that the affirmant intended to warrant and did not intend to express a mere matter of judgment or opinion.[54] In cases where the law implies a warranty, a party cannot secure the benefits of an express warranty by the use of words expressly stating the obligations which the law implies without such words.[55]

4. Intention of Parties. An affirmation made by the seller with respect to the thing sold amounts to a warranty if it appears to have been so intended and understood by the parties,[56] and not as a mere matter of opinion or judgment.[57] The rule is broadly stated in most decisions that a mere affirmation does not constitute a warranty unless shown to be so intended and understood by the parties, and not as a mere matter of opinion;[58] that in the contract of warranty, there must be an agreement of the minds of the contracting parties as in all other contracts.[59] And while there are decisions to the effect that the actual intent of the seller to warrant the thing sold is immaterial if the affirmations made — whether written or oral — and relied on by the buyer as an inducement to purchase, import a warranty,[60] that the seller is responsible for the language he uses,

New York.— Hawkins v. Pemberton, 51 N. Y. 198, 202, 10 Am. Rep. 595, where the court said: "If the contract be in writing and it contains a clear warranty, the vendor will not be permitted to say that he did not intend what his language clearly and explicitly declares; and so if it be by parol, and the representation as to the character or quality of the article sold be positive, not mere matter of opinion or judgment, and the vendee understands it as a warranty, and he relies upon it and is induced by it, the vendor is bound by the warranty, no matter whether he intended it to be a warranty or not." Naylor v. McSwegan, 2 Misc. 255, 21 N. Y. Suppl. 930.

and cannot escape liability by claiming that he did not intend to convey the impression which his representations were calculated to produce,[61] it is not believed that there is any conflict between this and the preceding proposition, as it amounts to no more than an application of the well settled principle that the secret intention of the parties, if different from the expressed intention, will not prevail, as the law looks to what the parties said as indicating the real intention.[62] The true aim in construing every agreement, that of warranty included, is of course to reach the real intention of the parties to it. This is accomplished, not by taking what they may afterward say their intentions were, but what they appear to have been from the words employed, the occasion of using them, and all accompanying facts and circumstances explanatory thereof.[63] It has been said that the decisive test in determining whether the affirmation was intended as a warranty is whether the seller assumes to assert a fact of which the buyer is ignorant, or merely states an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which the seller has no special knowledge and on which the buyer may also be expected to have an opinion and to exercise his judgment. In the former case there is a warranty, in the latter, not.[64]

5. Necessity For Reliance on Warranty.[65] In order to maintain an action for breach of warranty it must be shown that the warranty was relied on.[66] While the affirmation or promise need not have been the sole inducement to the purchase it must have been an operative cause.[67]

6. Knowledge of Defects — a. Of Buyer — (i) Obvious and Latent Defects. While as a general rule a general warranty will cover all latent defects,[68] it is also the rule that, except in certain cases hereinafter stated, a general warranty does not cover an obvious defect.[69] The reason for the rule rests on the presumed intention of the parties who cannot be supposed, the one to assert and the others to rely, on what they know to be untrue.[70] The rule that a general warranty will not extend to visible defects does not apply where the seller uses art to conceal and succeeds in concealing such defects,[71] or misrepresents their nature and effect.[72] Nor does it extend to an apparent defect to understand the nature of which requires special skill, knowledge, or judgment,[73] as where the defect is visible but the nature and effect thereof is not apparent or understood by the buyer.[74] And a warranty may be so expressed as to protect

All other defects, though apparent to some extent, but still equivocal and doubtful in their character, whether they are permanent or temporary, or whether they are mere harmless blemishes or but partially developed unsoundness, must be understood to be included and covered by a general warranty; and warranties are usually asked and given to protect purchasers against the risk presented by such cases."

(II) Inspection, Examination, or Test. Where there is an express warranty the buyer is under no obligation to inspect or examine the goods purchased, but may rely on the warranty.[78] The main purpose of a warranty is often to excuse examination and render examination unnecessary.[79] And even if the buyer does make an examination of the goods, this does not necessarily do away with the effect of the warranty.[80] A purchaser may examine the goods and exercise his own judgment, and at the same time may protect himself by taking a warranty.[81]

The buyer may take a warranty from both principal and agent if each saw fit to give a warranty. Kelly v. Clow Reaper Mfg. Co., 20 Minn. 88. It has been held, however, that where a written contract for the sale of a machine specified the warranties undertaken by the seller, and stipulated that no warranties, other than those expressly stated in the contract, should be binding on him, he was not responsible for an additional warranty subsequently made by his agent; and, upon the trial of an action brought by the seller against the purchaser for the price of the machine, evidence of such warranty, made by the agent, was inadmissible. statute of frauds.[98] So a parol warranty is not affected by a written warranty not agreed on between the parties.[99]

8. Descriptive Recitals in Instrument Containing Express Warranty. Where, in a contract of sale, the description of a chattel is followed by express words of warranty, the warranty does not extend to the descriptive recital.[1]

9. Statements Constituting Warranties[2] — a. In General. If during the course of a sale the seller makes representations which are positive representations of fact and not mere matters of opinion or judgment, for the purpose of inducing the buyer to purchase, and which are accepted and relied on by him in making the contract of purchase, such representations will constitute an express warranty.[3]

Sale of note and mortgage.— Upon the sale of a note and mortgage, the maker of which is known by both parties to be insolvent, if the vendor represents the mortgage to be good as an inducement to the vendee to buy, and the latter buys, relying upon such representation, this is a warranty. Hahn v. Doolittle, 18 Wis. 196, 86 Am. Dec. 757.

Sale of seed.— A statement in a sale of seed that it is a certain kind, the fact not being ascertainable by inspection, amounts to a warranty as to kind. Wolcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 496, 20 Am. Rep. 425; White v.

What a man positively affirms, with the view to induce another to part with his property, if relied on and confided in, he should be held to undertake and promise to be true. An affirmation in regard to an existing fact, distinctly and positively made in the negotiations for trade, should be regarded as a contract, and enforced as a warranty.[4]

Place where seed was grown.— Where defendant sold seed to plaintiff as the seed of a variety known as "flat Dutch cabbage seed," raised by Van Wycklen on Long Island, who raised it in a locality peculiarly adapted for raising seed that would head into cabbages, such statement amounted to a warranty that it was not only the seed of that variety, but that it had been raised by Van Wycklen on Long Island. Van Wyck v. Allen, 6 Daly (N. Y.) 376 [affirmed in 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136].

Early variety.— Where, on selling seed peas to a market gardener, plaintiff's agent expressly guaranteed them to "pick four or five days earlier than any other seed on the market," plaintiff is responsible for damages resulting from a breach of such warranty. Landreth v. Wyckoff, 67 N. Y. App. Div. 145, 73 N. Y. Suppl. 388.

Time of sailing or arrival.— Recitals in the contract as to the time of sailing of the vessel containing the goods or the time of their arrival are not warranties. Hawes v. Lawrence, 4 N. Y. 345 [affirming 3 Sandf. 193]; Rogers v. Woodruff, 23 Ohio St. 632, 13 Am. Rep. 276. But see Redlands Orange Growers' Assoc. v. Gorman, 161 Mo. 203, 61 S. W. 820, 54 L. R. A. 718 (holding that where a seller contracts to ship fruit to a buyer not later than a specified date, such stipulation as to the time of shipment is a warranty); Gorrissen v. Perrin, 2 C. B. N. S. 681, 3 Jur. N. S. 867, 27 L. J. C. P. 29, 5 Wkly. Rep. 709, 89 E. C. L. 681 (where a sale of goods "now on passage" was held to be a warranty that the goods were then on passage); Oppenheim v. Fraser, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 524 (where it was held to be a question for the jury whether on the sale of ship the recital "now at Rangoon" was a warranty or condition).

Mode of shipment.— Where defendants contracted to purchase from plaintiff one-half the cargo per Wachusett, chartered to load not exceeding two thousand two hundred tons nitrate of soda, to arrive at New York, and a marginal note on the contract provided that, should the vessel named be lost before reaching landing port, another vessel should be substituted, there was no warranty that the goods should be shipped per Wachusett. Browne v. Paterson, 165 N. Y. 460, 59 N. E. 296 [reversing 36 N. Y. App. Div. 167, 55 N. Y. Suppl. 404]. See also Johnson v. Macdonald, 6 Jur. 264, 12 L. J. Exch. 99, 9 M. & W. 600, where a sale of goods "to arrive ex Daniel Grant" was held not to be a warranty that the goods should arrive by the "Daniel Grant."

Indirect statements.—A statement by an agent, in selling the goods of his principal, that he has authority from the principal to warrant the goods sold, does not of itself constitute a warranty in law. Wilcox v. Henderson, 64 Ala. 535.

Promissory warranty.—Where plaintiff bought a defective machine, which he had taken on trial, the seller agreeing that it would repair and fix it so that it would do good work, the undertaking of the seller was a promissory warranty against known defects, and for its breach plaintiff had a right of action, although the purchase-price of the machine was still unpaid, and although he had the privilege of returning the machine. Fitzpatrick v. Osborne, 50 Minn. 261, 52 N. W. 861.

Construction of stipulation.—Where plaintiffs by letter offered to install certain grates and blowers under defendant's boilers, saying that prompt acceptance would be necessary so that the apparatus could be installed the next Sunday, and that part of the work might have to go over till the next Sunday, but that there would be no delay in the operation of the plant, there was no warranty that after the apparatus was installed it would so operate that there would never be any delay in the operation of the plant because of it. Beggs v. James Hanley Brewing Co., 27 R. I. 385, 62 Atl. 373, 114 Am. St. Rep. 44.

Modification of contract.—Where plaintiff, after examining drawings furnished by defendant, contracted to construct for him in accordance therewith a machine which would work "smoothly and well," the fact that changes in the plans and the machine were afterward found to be necessary, and that defendant authorized them, and promised to pay the additional expense, will not relieve plaintiff from compliance with his warranty. 4. Sweet v. Bradley, 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 549.

Sale of bonds.— In the sale of a lot of city bonds where it was alleged that "the defendants agreed that the principal and interest of the bonds was or should be guarantied and provided for by a sinking fund set aside for that purpose"; "that such representations and agreements for the securing of bonds were a material part of the contract," etc., the representations alleged constitute a warranty that the bonds were or would be secured by an adequate fund for their ultimate payment. Callanan v. Brown, 31 Iowa 333.

animal had not been brought from the mountains during that season, and was therefore not liable to distemper, the representations constituted a warranty. Bryce v. Parker, 11 S. C. 337.

Non-infringement of patent.—An agreement by the seller of a "heater," "to protect the sale from infringements on other heaters," amounts to a warranty that the article sold is not an infringement of any patent. Croninger v. Paige, 48 Wis. 229, 4 N. W. 106.

Statements as to price.—The seller's declaring he will sell as cheap as the same goods can be bought in a city named is not a warranty obliging him to reduce the agreed price to the price current in the city named on that day. Falkner v. Lane, 58 Ga. 116.

See 43 Cent. Dig. tit. "Sales," § 731.

Sale of patent.— A statement, by one selling patent rights, that the patented article was "a valuable and useful improvement" is but an expression of opinion, on which the buyer has no right to rely. Bain v. Withey, 107 Ala. 223, 18 So. 217.

Power of mill stream.—A statement by the vendor, in the sale of a mill and water power, that "the stream would furnish water to run the mill day and night eight months of the year" is a mere expression of opinion and does not constitute a warranty. Clark v. Ralls, 50 Iowa 275.

Mode of packing.—Where defendant was present at plaintiff's packing and keeping of certain fruit trees sold by him to defendant, plaintiff's assurances that the trees were not injured thereby did not amount to a warranty but a mere expression of opinion. Baker v. Henderson, 24 Wis. 509.

Sale of article as purchased.—Where, in a parol agreement for the sale of a certain amount of sound corn, to be delivered, the seller stated that he had just purchased the corn from some other person as sound corn, and would sell it as such, this was nothing but a representation of belief and not a warranty. The purchaser could have refused acceptance or returned the goods, and thus protected himself from loss. Lawton v. Keil, 61 Barb. (N. Y.) 558.

Speculative declarations.— Declarations as to the amount of wool that certain sheep would yield, and the time in which the vendee could pay for them, and whether he would have wool left after paying, are mere speculations as to the future, and cannot import a warranty; but the rule is otherwise as to declarations that said sheep were young and healthy. Bryant v. Crosby, 40 Me. 9.

merely matters of commendation,[7] such representations falling within the maxim simplex commendatio non obligat.[8] There must be an affirmation as to the quality or condition of the thing sold, not asserted as a matter of opinion or belief, made by the seller at the time of the sale, for the purpose of assuring the buyer of the truth of the fact affirmed and inducing him to make the purchase, which is so received and relied on by the purchaser.[9] No expression of opinion, however strong, would import a warranty.[10]

c. Matter of Description.[11] Mere words of description in an executory contract of sale do not ordinarily constitute a warranty.[12] But it is very generally held that a description or designation of the goods by name, brand, or kind is a warranty that they are of the kind or character described,[13] and that this is so

Disclaimer of knowledge.— It is not a warranty to sell a horse as of the age stated in a written pedigree, if at the time the seller declared that he knew nothing of the horse's age but what he learned from the written pedigree. Dunlop v. Waugh, 1 Peake, N. P. 123.

Instructions.— In an action for breach of warranty of a mare the court properly refused to instruct the jury to determine whether the seller asserted a fact of which the purchaser was ignorant, or merely stated his opinion in regard to a matter of which he had no special knowledge, and in which the purchaser might be expected to exercise his own judgment, when the seller had told the purchaser that he knew the mare to be "sound in every respect," and that he would warrant her to be so. Van Hoesen v. Cameron, 54 Mich. 609, 20 N. W. 609. But in an action for breach of warranty as to the age of sheep sold, an instruction that if defendant knew the ages, and had means of knowledge, the jury should consider these facts, with all other facts in evidence, in determining whether he stated such ages as his opinion or as facts, is proper. Warranty, not commendation.—Where a purchaser orders a certain machine by letter, stating that it is to do specific work, and the seller answers, accepting the order, and stating, "You may rely on having a first-rate machine, which will do your work in a satisfactory manner," these last words are not mere words of commendation, but are to be construed as part of the contract, and constituting a warranty. Statement as to sizes.—A memorandum of whether the vendor knew his affirmation to be false or not, because the injury by deception is just as great whether it be wilful or innocent.[14] The rule is just. It holds a dealer responsible for breach of a contract when he sells a thing as being of a particular kind, if it does not answer the description, the vendee not knowing whether the vendor's representations are true or false but relying upon them as true.[15] In sales of the character under consideration there is no warranty of quality,[16] unless the description carries with it a well known and generally understood quality.[17] If, however, the goods are described as of a certain quality, the words of description will be construed as a warranty of quality,[18] especially if the quality is a material and essential part of the description.[19]

d. Statements in Catalogues and Other Advertisements. If the statements are relied on by the purchaser, a warranty may be predicated of statements con-sale which simply set forth certain sizes and classes of lumber, and fixed the selling price thereof, should be construed as describing the kind of lumber wanted, and not as a warranty as to its width and thickness. Brown v. Baird, 5 Okla. 133, 48 Pac. 180. To the same effect see Neff v. McNeeley, 1 Nebr. (Unoff.) 416, 96 N. W. 150.

Sale of pictures.— The description of a picture as by a particular named artist is not necessarily a warranty. Jendwine v. Slade, 2 Esp. 572, 5 Rev. Rep. 754. tained in the catalogue of the seller,[20] circulars,[21] or advertisements relating to the goods.[22] If the statements are mere expressions of opinion,[23] or are not intended to be and are not relied on as warranties, they cannot be availed of as such,[24] and a purchaser cannot avail himself of representations in a circular the contents of which were not known to him.[25]

e. Statements as to Quality or Condition[26] — (i) In General. A direct and positive affirmation or promise of a fact as to the quality of the goods made by the seller at the time of the sale as an inducement to the sale and on which the purchaser relied amounts to an express warranty of quality,[27] and this rule

Supplemental catalogue.— The statement of a horse's age in a supplemental catalogue of sale is not a warranty where the catalogue proper contained the conditions of sale, and the statement that "ages and heights of horses are approximated by owners, and are believed to be correct, but are not guarantied," since persons buying under a supplemental catalogue are chargeable with notice that they must look elsewhere for the terms and conditions of sale. Henry v. Salisbury, 14 N. Y. App. Div. 526, 43 N. Y. Suppl. 851.

21. Snow v. Schomacker Mfg. Co., 69 Ala. 111, 44 Am. Rep. 509, holding that where the manufacturer of a musical instrument offered to sell it by letter, stating the terms of the sale and calling attention to a circular advertising the instrument which he had sent by the same mail, which circular stated that the instrument was warranted for five years, the offer of the warranty in the circular became a part of the offer of sale and, on acceptance a part of the contract of purchase. And see Charter Gas-Engine Co. v. Kellam, 79 N. Y. App. Div. 231, 79 N. Y. Suppl. 1019; Robson v. Miller, 12 S. C. 586, 32 Am. Rep. 518. Compare Hicks v. Stevens, 121 Ill. 186, 11 N. See also Prideaux v. McMurray, 2 F. & F. 225.

Testimonials from other purchasers.— The fact that a vendor presented to a purchaser a circular, with testimonials, of a meat-cooler offered by him for sale, and said that his cooler was the only one in the world that would keep meat any length of time properly, is not sufficient to sustain a finding that he guaranteed the same to keep meat as long as the testimonials claimed it would. Sufficiency of affirmation.—An affirmation that a horse is not lame, accompanied by the declaration of the owner that he would not be afraid to warrant him, is enough to establish a warranty. Cook v. Moseley, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 277.

General statements.—Where the vendor at a public auction sale of a number of horses publicly stated "that all horses which would then and there be offered for sale had been driven single," and that all horses which were not safe to drive single would be specified when sold, if horses were afterward sold without any statement as to whether they were safe to drive single, there was a warranty that they were safe. Ingraham v. Union R. Co., 19 R. I. 356, 33 Atl. 875.

Indirect warranty.— In McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Brower, 88 Iowa 607, 55 N. W. 537, a contract for the sale of a harvesting machine recited that it was "warranted to be well made, of good material, and durable with proper care. If upon one day's trial, the machine should not work well, the purchaser shall give immediate notice to" the company, etc., and it was held that the warranty was not all embraced in the provision that it was "well made, of good material, and durable with proper care," but the contract warranted the machine to "work well."

As to future event.—Where A wrote to B that he had a fine steer for sale, and that the steer had a sore under his neck, "but that don't hurt him; it is most well," and B wrote that if the steer was as good as represented he would buy it, and that A might send it, A's statement that the sore would get well amounted to a warranty. Branson v. Turner, 77 Mo. 489. And see Ellis v. Riddick, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 256, 78 S. W. 719.

Guaranty to pass inspection.—A guaranty that the articles shall pass inspection is a warranty of quality of the goods sold. Gibson v. Stevens, 8 How. (U. S.) 384, 12 L. ed. 1123.

Acceptance of order.—Where the buyer offered to purchase iron "quality to be strictly neutral," and the seller's acceptance was in terms "quality of iron to be neutral" there was an express warranty. Philadelphia, etc., Coal, etc., Co. v. Hoffman, 1 Pa. Cas. 405, 4 Atl. 848. To the same effect see Groetzinger v. Kann, 165 Pa. St. 578, 30 Atl. 1043, 44 Am. St. Rep. 676.

Sale by brand.—Where, in an action for the price of "Standard" rubber belting sold in July, 1887, defendants set off a breach of warranty in a lot of belting of the same brand sold them in May, 1886, for which they paid before discovering its worthlessness, and plaintiff claims that it never warranted the "Standard" belting which it claimed to have first put on the market in 1886, an order from defendants in 1885 for good "Standard" belting, "warranted," and plaintiff's invoice describing the belting as "Standard," are admissible to show a warranty as claimed by defendants. Gutta Percha, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Wood, 84 Mich. 452, 48 N. W. 28.

Qualified acceptance.—Where a buyer ordered one hundred thousand bicycle handle bar stem castings, as per sample submitted, to be made of the best grade of steel suitable for the purpose, and the seller agreed to furnish "100,000 handle bar stem castings to be made of steel," the seller only warranted that the character of the metal used should be steel, and not that it should be of the best grade or suitable for the purpose intended. Frederick Mfg. Co. v. Devlin, 127 Fed. 71, 62 C. C. A. 53.

Qualified warranty.—Where a fertilizer is warranted "as to its effect on crops only as to the analysis of the state inspector as evidenced by his brand on each and every package," the purchaser takes every risk save that of the genuineness of the inspector's brand. Jackson v. Langston, 61 Ga. 392. And see Allen v. Young, 62 Ga. 617.

Indefinite statement.—Where a firm writes to their agent, with regard to the condition of a lot of hams shipped to the agent, that "there is an occasional ham sour in the marrow," but that the hams as a body were not sour, which letter the agent showed to a proposed buyer of the hams, the statement contained in the letter was too indefinite to constitute a warranty that less than a third of is made in response to a direct inquiry on the part of the buyer,[28] or in contemplation of the purpose for which the goods are purchased.[29]

(II) SOUNDNESS. A direct and positive affirmation that an animal is sound amounts to a warranty of soundness,[30] and so too does an affirmation that the animal is "all right." [31] But a warranty of soundness cannot be predicated on a statement that the animal is a "good" one,[32] or upon a statement that is expressed merely as a matter of judgment, opinion, or belief.[33]

(III) FITNESS FOR PURPOSE. Of course a direct affirmation that an article is suitable for the purpose for which it is purchased is a warranty,[34] and so too a warranty may be predicated on a direct affirmation of quality made in con-

the hams were sour in the marrow. Wiggin v. Butcher, 154 Mass. 447, 28 N. E. 677.

Warranty or stipulation as to price.— Where in a contract for the sale of varnish stipulations as to quality were followed by the words: "Turpentine copal varnish at 65 cts. per gallon; turpentine japan dryer at 55 cts. per gallon," the letter terms were but stipulations as to price, and imported no warranty that the goods delivered should be articles known to the trade by those names, and of a certain standard of quality. Qualified warranty.—Where the seller warranted the horse to be sound everywhere, except a kick on the leg, this was a qualified warranty. Jones v. Cowley, 4 B. & C. 445, 6 D. & R. 533, 3 L. J. K. B. O. S. 263, 10 E. C. L. 653. And see Garment v. Baris, 2 Esp. 673.

Indirect statements.—Where a note given for the price of a horse stated that it was given for a horse "a little thick-winded," such words did not amount to an express warranty that the horse was sound, and that the little thick-windedness would not hurt it. Bullard v. Brewer, 118 Ga. 918, 45 S. E. 711.

"Warrant and defend."—A statement in the bill of sale that "I hereby warrant and defend" the property sold is a warranty of soundness. Livingston v. Arrington, 28 Ala. 424; Duff v. Ivy, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 140. Contra, Roseman v. Hughey, Rice (S. C.) 437.

Dealer's talk.—Where an auctioneer, in offering for sale a lot of sheep, stated that they were "a nice lot of young, sound sheep," the representation did not amount to a warranty. McGraw v. Forsythe, 31 Iowa 179.

Intent immaterial.—Where the sellers of an irrigating pump and plant knew the use for which it was intended, and selected the land and the pump, and expressly represented that it would accomplish the work of irrigation, and warranted the machinery for that purpose, it constitutes a warranty, if the buyer relied thereon, whether or not the seller intended it. Huntington v. Lombard, 22 Wash. 202, 60 Pac. 414.

Substitution of article.—Where one contracted to sell an engine of a certain make, size, and capacity, with knowledge that it was to be used to run a sawmill, and furnished an engine of another size under a guaranty that the latter would develop the capacity of the engine contracted for, the guaranty must be construed as a warranty that the engine furnished would develop for the particular use the same power as the engine contracted for. Critcher v. Porter-McNeal Co., 135 N. C. 542, 47 S. E. 604.

Comparison with other goods.—A warranty that a machine is capable with proper management of doing as much as other machines of like size and proportions is not an absolute warranty that it is sufficient for a special purpose, but only that it is as fit for the purpose as other machines of like size and proportions. Trapp v. New Birdsall Co., 109 Wis. 543, 85 N. W. 478.

templation of the purpose for which it was desired.[35] But no warranty of fitness for purpose is imported by a statement that the article is "good," [36] or that it will be finished in a "first-class workmanlike manner." [37] And a provision in a contract that a machine sold is "to be complete in everything for working" is not an express warranty that the machine would do the work for which it was purchased.[38]

(IV) Comparison With Sample or Other Goods. It is a warranty of quality where the seller affirms that the goods sold are equal or superior to other goods of like kind on the market,[39] or that they shall correspond to the sample.[40] So too a warranty of quality is imported in an affirmation that the goods sold shall be equal to certain other goods [41] then being sold to other parties [42] or equal to goods theretofore furnished to the buyer.[43]

f. Statements as to Title.[44] An affirmation by the seller that the goods are his or that he is the owner constitutes a warranty of title,[45] and he will be liable

Sale by sample and description.—Where goods are sold, by sample, and by description as well, with a warranty that they shall correspond with both the description and sample. it is not sufficient that the bulk of the goods correspond with the sample, if they do not also correspond with the description; and the vendee may retain them and rely upon his warranty as to description. Breach.— In an action on a warranty guaranteeing that the engine sold was capable, with proper management, of doing as much as other machines of like size and proportions, it was error to submit the question of a breach thereof to the jury on evidence as to the ability of the engine to maintain fifteen horse power, where it was not shown that engines of like size and proportions could maintain fifteen horse power. Property not in seller's possession.—Where a bill of sale conveys all right, title, and interest in a liquor-tax certificate, the seller expressly warrants the sale, although the certificate was not at the time in his possession. Frank v. Forgotston, 30 Misc. (N. Y.) 816, 61 N. Y. Suppl. 1118 [reversed on other grounds in 31 Misc. 726, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 229].

on his warranty, although the purchaser knew the title was not perfect.[46] A warranty of title cannot, however, be predicated on a recital "I have sold," [47] or on the words "warrant and defend," nor the words "warrant to be good, sound property, and healthy." [48] So it has been held that a recital in a conveyance of a street railway franchise that it was "duly given" by the city council does not amount to an express warranty that the seller had good title to the franchise conveyed.[49]

g. Statements as to Value. While representations as to value are usually regarded as "dealer's talk," [50] value may nevertheless be made the subject of warranty in a sale;[51] and if the seller makes a representation as to value which is intended as a warranty, and it enters as a constituent element into the transaction, it will then become a part of the contract and may be enforced as a warranty.[52] But a statement as to quality is not a warranty of value.[53]

h. Statements as to Quantity. Statements as to the weight or quantity of the goods are usually regarded as mere expressions of opinion and not as warranties.[54] Such statements may, however, constitute warranties if expressions are used showing an intent on the part of the seller to bind himself by the statements.[55]

Value of shares.—Where at the time of transfer of bank stock to plaintiff as part of the price of land conveyed by him, the grantee stated that the bank was organized under the laws of Pennsylvania; that the stock was worth one hundred cents on the dollar; and that it was good, high dividend paying stock, the statement was an express warranty that the stock was worth its face value, and that the bank was duly organized as stated. Titus v. Poole, 73 Hun (N. Y.) 383, 26 N. Y. Suppl. 451 [affirmed in 145 N. Y. 414, 40 N. E. 228].

Desirability of shares as investment.—Representations of fact as to the property of an oil company, its productiveness, and other conditions relating to the value and desirability of its shares as an investment, are proper elements of a warranty in the sale of the stock, and are not objectionable, as relating to property other than the thing sold. Phillips v. Crosby, 69 N. J. L. 612, 55 Atl. 814.

Ambiguous statement.—A contract providing for the exchange of a stock of merchandise for real estate, the stock to be invoiced "as per the following mark," is sufficiently indefinite and ambiguous to justify the refusal of an instruction that such provision was a warranty that the goods actually cost what they were marked. Webb v. Steiner, 113 Mo. App. 482, 87 S. W. 618.

Price.—A statement as to the cost is not a warranty that the price so fixed was the price actually paid by the seller. Mason v. Thornton, 74 Ark. 46, 84 S. W. 1048.

Sale of shares of stock.—The owners of stock in a very large and growing corporation gave an option for the purchase of the stock. The option was given on Feb. 24, 1899, and was dated Feb. 1, 1899, and recited that the corporation was the owner of the assets and indebted to the amount shown in an annexed schedule; but appended to the schedule was a paper entitled "Explanatory Notes," which stated that the schedule was prepared from the balance sheet of April, 1898, and corresponded therewith, except that the bills payable had been increased and might thereafter be increased according to the requirements of the business, and except as to the statement of the values of certain stocks and good-will, and as to the value of certain patents belonging to the company. There was evidence that the sellers had stated, before the option was accepted, that they could not and did not intend any warranty of the floating indebtedness. It was held that the recital, schedule, and the explanatory notes did not amount to a warranty. Worthington v. Herrmann, 89 N. Y. App. Div. 627, 88 N. Y. Suppl. 76 [affirmed in 180 N. unless excluded by the existence of express warranties,[56] or other terms of the contract,[57] certain warranties may be implied in a complete contract of sale, whether oral or written,[58] except sales by public or quasi-public officers.[59] The implication of a warranty must, however, rest on rules of law and cannot be based on custom or usage.[60]

2. Effect of Custom or Usage.[61] Although it has been held in some cases that a warranty may be implied by custom,[62] the decided weight of authority is to the effect that a warranty will not be implied by usage or custom when none is implied by the common law,[63] nor can custom or usage be shown against a warranty implied by law.[64] To permit this to be done, it has been said, would be extremely pernicious in its consequences and render vague and uncertain all the rules of law on the sale of chattels.[65] Custom or usage may, however, be resorted to to explain a warranty implied by law,[66] and show its extent.[67]

3. Written Contracts. While it has been held in some instances that no warranty will be implied when the contract of sale is in writing,[68] most of the cases involved the question of quality and must therefore be regarded as mere variations of statement of the general rule,[69] although on the theory that it is in the nature of an addition by parol to a written contract the principle has been applied to other warranties.[70] Certainly the general rule is well established by authority that warranties may be implied when the contract is in writing as well as when it is oral,[71] and especially has the rule been asserted as to the implied warranty of title.[72] provision, in a contract of sale of two hundred and fifty gunny bags to arrive by ship, that they shall "average four hundred and forty pounds gross per bale, or no sale, buyer's option," was a warranty only against deficiency in weight, and the contract was not voidable on account of their averaging nearly four hundred and fifty pounds.

merchantability.[78] Nor does an express warranty of quality exclude an implied warranty of title,[79] or an express warranty that the article should be in good order exclude an implied warranty of fitness for the purpose intended.[80] So where the buyer waives an express warranty he may rely on the warranty implied by law.[81]

5. Refusal to Warrant. When the seller has expressly refused to give a warranty, no warranty can be implied by law.[82]

6. Subjects of Implied Warranty — a. In General. Generally speaking an implied warranty may arise as to any subject relating to the property sold, such as the title,[83] merchantability,[84] fitness for purpose intended,[85] and genuineness of the article sold.[86] So too there is a general warranty implied that goods to be manufactured shall fill the terms of the contract.[87] There is not, however, as a rule any implied warranty of quality,[88] or value,[89] or even of quantity;[90] but if the goods are to be paid for by weight as determined by the seller's scales there is an implied warranty that the scales shall be lawful scales.[91] In the case of a sale of a crop to be produced, no warranty of its continued existence will be implied.[92]

b. Title[93] — (i) In General. By the early English rule no warranty of title was implied in a sale;[94] but in later decisions it was recognized that the doctrine

caveat emptor applies.[7] It is, however, conceded that a constructive possession is sufficient.[8]

(III) KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTS. If the buyer has knowledge of the defects in the seller's title no warranty will be implied,[9] but the mere fact that the buyer knows the source of the seller's title does not charge him with notice of defects.[10] The theory of the rule is that the seller knows his title better than the buyer can possibly know it, and this is sufficient to support the implied warranty.[11] Similarly the buyer's knowledge of the existence of an apparent encumbrance does not charge him with notice that the encumbrance will ripen into a paramount title.[12]
